PREFACE

“Yale is a place for work.” But there were lapses, too, as we remember it, and the lapses are pleasant memories not to be forgotten. The object of this book is to photograph a few of them for your enjoyment. Little attention has been given to organized extra-curriculum activities, not for the purpose of minimizing their importance, but because these other incidents have greater power to keep alive pleasant memories.

When the members of the Class have become scattered, it is hoped that these pages may help them to look back upon Yale and wish to become again undergraduates to be excluded from the Graduates Club along with “Ladies and dogs.”

One last word—do not be modest in supplying your secretary with facts about yourself.

To
JAMES W. D. INGERSOLL, GUIDE AND FRIEND,
THIS VOLUME IS AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED BY THE CLASS.

Members of the Class of 1916,

Yale College Gentlemen. - It is my misfortune rather than my fault that I am not personally acquainted with all of you, so I hope it will not be regarded as presumptuous of me to address a word to you here collectively, on the invitation of your editor. My acquaintance with those of you whom good fortune has allowed me to know has been such as to make it a pleasure for me to have this opportunity. Were there space, I should be glad to bear witness here to some of the pleasant details that stand out clearly in my thoughts & memories of the Class of 1916 as I have known it. I can only say that those details are many - dating all the way from Freshman year - & that I shall not forget them.

A teacher does not ordinarily - at least not immediately from his teaching - gather riches that will swell his bank-account, but I am convinced by my own experience that there is no worker in any field who reaps a richer harvest of the things that make the heart glad & all the days of one's life pleasant than he whose good fortune it is to associate year after year, in the friendly relations of the class-room & the campus, with the rising generation of American manhood. For the part which you have played, members of 1916, in thus making my days pleasant I thank you most heartily; I count it great good-fortune to have known you; & I wish for you all a life of high ideals & worthy achievement.

Sincerely yours,

J. W. D. Ingersoll
("S.B." for shot).

HISTORY OF THE CLASS

"Youth is the Heyday of Romance." My task here is to set down the history of Youth, the Infancy, of the Class of 1916. If the episodes of that time, as written here, seem a bit unbelievable, lay it to the romance of youth.

Ours was the "greatest" class that had ever entered Yale, for it numbered 412. Old Alumni Hall had been torn down against the day of our coming and Wright Hall erected in its stead. The half of the class fortunate enough to gain admittance to the palatial quarters of Wright accepted their lot without a murmur and the rest were contented with dwelling in "262 York" or within the recesses of Pierson, where one soon learned to don a miner's cap and light on entering the lower hall.

We found mutual friends in the Roseys, Cornelius and Klig, and enemies in the army of solicitors which assaulted our doors and tricked us into "signing up" for a hundred-and-one different things. It was not until the night of September 26, however, that we realized that we were an entity—the Class of 1916.

The marshals of the rush called "Nineteen-sixteen this way" and, in time, some of the more daring of our classmates took up the cry. The parade formed in front of Osborn and, with the Second Regiment Band at its head, marched down College Street to Elm and back to the Campus, where the wrestling matches were held. Our own Dick Gurley was acclaimed the champion of 1916 rights in the lightweight bout and was pitted against George Ewing of 1915. Ewing obtained a fall. Bull Roberts won from G. Gardner of 1915 and Bayne Denègre threw Wes Oler in an exciting match in the heavyweight division.

The rush itself was the first ever held on the Campus, faculty decree having brought that time-honored institution over from York Street. The Class of 1916 defended a goal formed by two elms at the end of Connecticut, while the Sophomores presented a formidable array before Durfee. The Sophomores pursued a "watchful waiting" policy while the Freshmen went at top speed down the Campus, shouldering the push-ball before them. The tussle which ensued was a memorable one, especially for the men who got under the ball in the scramble. The 1916 defense was adamant and, as a result of the deadlock which ensued, 1915 set in motion a flank movement which placed the push-ball in a prominent position on Dwight Hall steps, when the marshals called the rush a draw.

The cheering in Wright Court, after we had been assembled by the Senior "Y" men who acted as marshals, started a bit haltingly, but by degrees assumed volume and the words came with certainty. At last we felt that we knew the Yale cheer, and the crowd—the first formal gathering of 1916—broke up. The Pierson contingent and Wright Hall men who ventured off the campus had numerous exciting encounters with "townies" armed with lead pipes and clubs, with the result that many caps were lost; and Bunny Burgess is reputed to have sustained a broken nose when he attempted to recapture his hat as it was disappearing down an alley.

It was a memorable night. Nineteen hundred and sixteen had been initiated into the ways of Yale. That night four hundred and twelve members of our class went over again the events of the rush; the flaming torches which lighted the center of the closely packed ring around the wrestlers, the jostling, pushing, panting crowd about the push-ball, the white "Y's" on the blue sweaters of the marshals and the cheering in the court after the celebration—impressions as vivid now as then.

BEFORE NAMES WERE MADE

To the Freshman who had come to New Haven with the idea that his studies would be all that was required of him, September 27th was a rude awakening. On that evening was held the formal reception for 1916 in Dwight Hall. President Hadley offered the metaphorical handshake and opportunities for extra-curriculum activity were pointed out by an imposing array of leaders and captains.

The reception itself, if the truth be known, was a trying affair. Upperclassmen stood in the reception line and did their best to make the guests feel at ease. The task was a difficult one, for little cliques of awkwardly self-conscious Freshmen gathered in spite of the best efforts of the hosts. Propinquity, even intimacy was forced upon us, however, for the room soon began to fill. When President Hadley finished speaking the room was closely packed. By the time opportunities in track had been discussed, the temperature of the room had reached eighty and the close of the invitation to become members of the Lit board saw a sturdy Freshman carried out in a faint. A wild scramble for refreshments, which consisted of frankfurters and ginger ale served in the basement, gave the reception the finishing touch.

The following night we went over to a part of New Haven we were beginning to know as "Sheff-town" to witness the

IN RE BARNEY, DECEASED

Sheff Freshman rush. We fully expected to see them burn the Temple Street bridge and suffer the penalty of being placed on probation, as their predecessors had been, but, as leaders for such an enterprise were lacking, we returned disappointed.

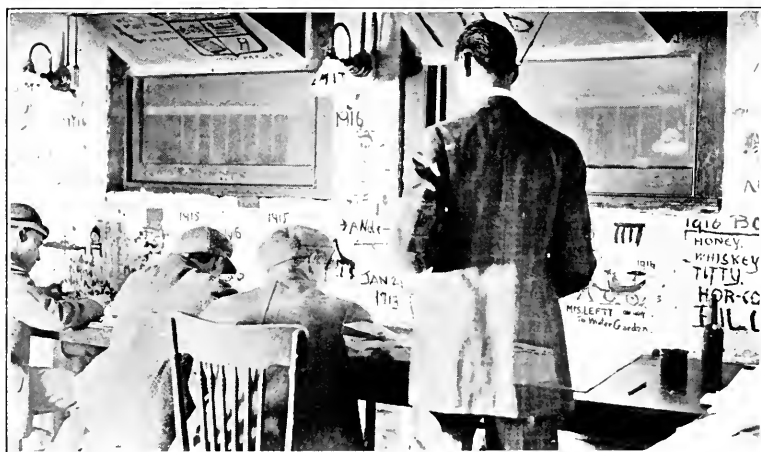

Shortly following this, we had our first introduction to New Haven society at a tea given by President and Mrs. Hadley. Half of 1916 went one day and half the next so that there were few of us who missed being present at least once. One member of the class attended on both occasions and was mortified to find President Hadley's memory of his first visit so perfect that a second introduction was unnecessary.

Our football team was by now in the process of evolution, and October saw the development of many men who later were to distinguish themselves on the varsity. Pie Way, Aleck Wilson, Otis Guernsey, Herman von Holt, Bull Roberts and Eddie Hubbard were among the football stars who appeared on the horizon. Otis developed an uncanny sense of direction in his toe, with the result that he tied the game with Princeton 1916 in the final minute of play by a 40-yard drop kick. Our team was undefeated until the final game in which the Harvard Freshmen beat us by a score of 18 to 17.

On October 5th, the crew men reported for work. Allan McLane's gift of expression won him a place as cox. of the 1916 "eight" and Seth Low found a seat in the waist of the boat. Seth is reputed to have assumed such a crimson tint as the shell passed a group of girls on the wharf at the "Ferry" that he was taken for a well-tanned Harvard man, rowing in a sweater. Johnny Fitzpatrick was another to "make" the Freshman eight. The four-oared crew was entirely uncontaminated by Sheff influence. In the bow was Sam Gaillard, wrestler and single-sculler. At No. 3 was Phil Schwartz, whose high-crowned hat was later destined to bob in and out in a Connecticut orchard, where he led the life of the traditional country squire. At No. 2 was Charlie Dickey, the hockey player, while at stroke was Henry Hume, whose crimson thatch made a port light quite unnecessary. The 1916 representation on the squad was completed by Warren Ransom, who became the pride of the "Ferry" by virtue of his ability to consume Beechnut gum.

October saw our class split in twain over the world's series. One half, led by Roly Vaughn, averred the Red Sox would wipe the earth with the Giants, while Art Lane and his followers insisted that the hub of the baseball world was New York. A goodly majority of the class journeyed to the playograph at the Casino to watch the progress of the games and make bets. Exchange in New York on Boston jumped skyward after Snodgrass muffed Engel's easy fly in the tenth inning of the deciding game of the series. In the Inter-class track meet at the Field on October 17th, 1916 took the palm with 49 points, the Juniors being second with 38½ points.

Our first glimpse of the Whiffenpoofs came on November 9th at the Brown game. Two days later we went to the gym and practiced songs and cheers for the Princeton game. The following Saturday saw an exodus to Princeton, when Pumpelly in the final minute of play made himself famous by a 51-yard drop kick, tying the score at 6 to 6.

On November 23d, President Hadley and a score or more of capped and gowned graduates outflanked the matutinal hymns of Dwight and the automobile klaxons from Elm Street and made their voices sufficiently audible to dedicate formally Wright Hall. At the close of the first term exams caught some of us amidsthips, and with our number somewhat reduced by a broadside from the Dean's Office, we proceeded full speed ahead to our homes on December 19th.

The Christmas festivities over, February saw Gerty Hoffman and Gaby Deslys come and go in rapid succession, the appearance of the latter being notable for the fact that there was no riot. Newspapers of the morning of February 16th had headlines, "Four Faint as Dean Brown Prays," an allusion to the happenings in Woolsey during the morning chapel of the previous day. Red Rumelin soon after came into his own and discovered a silver mine located in the telephone in the corner entry of Wright. He immediately developed the "property" by throwing the telephone down two flights of stairs, a method which proved eminently successful for Red struck a pay streak of nickels, dimes and quarters. Eddie Ocumpaugh had already qualified for the honor he was to win later as Yale's best dressed man.

The approach of Washington's birthday was the signal for the death knell of a Yale tradition known as Washington's Birthday rush. At noon of February 20th, the class of 1915 met and decided to stay away from the rush. Nevertheless it was our class that performed the obsequies over this ancient custom for at 6.45 o'clock that evening 1916 met in solemn conclave in Osborn, and, urged by some of Aleck Wilson's oratory, took the same action.

March brought us an insight into the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde existence of our contemporaries in Sheff through Gundelfinger's "Ice Lens." About this time Naomi eloped from the Old Eli with a Sheff Freshman and thus rid Yale of a traditional fraud. This "heroine-worship" was not confined to Sheff, however, for Edna attracted huge crowds at the Studio, where our class unfailingly maintained a watchful representation from 11 to 11.

With the first snowfall, the chaste profile of Wright began to assume a dilapidated appearance, as sofa cushions replaced window panes. Bills for repairs followed from the Bursar's Office with alarming frequency.

Pierson gained an unsavory reputation with the New Haven police. The balconies on the fifth floor were particularly advantageous positions from which to drop water bags on passers-by. The climax came when the police inspector, on his way home from a dance in his dress clothes, met a huge water bag head-on as he passed Pierson. Police made for the interior of the building as rapidly as possible, but by the time they reached the fifth floor the occupants were "fast asleep." Wild Bill Eckman and Herman von Holt were the leading spirits in the Pierson uprisings. They "reaped the whirlwind" in the spring when the Dean's Office placed the entire fifth floor on probation for attempting a return to the barbaric practice of "bottle night."

All the electric lights in Wright Hall went out on the night of March 14th. Heads were stuck out of windows and burning papers were thrown out into the court and piled into a bonfire. Someone appeared with a bass-drum and we had a procession through Sheff-town and down Chapel Street.

Spring vacation of Freshman year was a welcome relief from the exactions of scholastic endeavor. To those westerners who returned home, it was particularly pleasant, for the Dayton flood prevented their return on time and a special dispensation from the Dean's Office excused the cuts. On our return we found all the movies in town running Sunday benefits for the flood sufferers and we contributed our dimes and quarters with enthusiasm.

Professor W. H. Taft was fittingly welcomed on April 1st by a hugh procession which accompanied the former-president to Woolsey Hall, where he delivered a brief speech. Don Fitts upheld the honor of 1916 by out-generalling the New York photographers. He crawled out on the coping of The Dining Hall and obtained a remarkable photograph of the new Kent Professor of Law making his maiden speech as a member of the Yale faculty.

Romance entered our midst in April. On the thirteenth the Convict Slave ship tied up at the city wharf and a dozen-odd stevedores, fittingly disguised as convicts and laden with the perennial ball and chain, marched through the streets, guarded by a man with a rifle. The imagination of 1916 was so stirred by the sight that half the class, urged on by magazine offers of "fabulous fortunes for fine film features," began writing movie plays. Otts Wood and George Dovenmuehle came the nearest of anyone to making money, George having seventy-nine manuscripts, containing thirty times as many scenarios, rejected.

The annual Spring Regatta on New Haven harbor was followed quickly by Omega Lambda Chi and Tap Day. On May 13th we were brought closely in touch with the latter ceremony when we were called to a class meeting of 1916 and asked to stay away from the sacred oak. We agreed. The day itself was a revelation to most of us, who witnessed it for the first time. Necks were craned from the windows of Wright and shoulders gave way beneath the weight of those above. A large contingent from Sheff held places of vantage on Wright Hall steps.

Our baseball team lost to the Harvard Freshmen by a score of 7 to 4. Unfortunately rain prevented the Princeton game. Roly Vaughn, Chat Taylor, Dud Mudge, Red Rummelin, Roy Wilcox, Pie Way, Larry Walsh and Gus Wells were awarded numerals. In track we were victorious over both Harvard and Princeton, a fact which Harry Crocker's tooth-comb band blared to the heavens above Wright Hall court.

The crew was at the "Ferry," the championship baseball games were near at hand and the News carried advertisements of the best routes home, when the fence orations were given. Gil Porter and Archie McLeish effected the transfer of that ancient collection of initials. The flow of wit and verbiage, excellent in themselves, gave a stimulus to introspection on the part of members of 1916 which had not been afforded since the night of our rush. We had run the first lap of our college race. Some had dropped by the wayside, others had achieved the heights and yet every man, no matter what his deeds or misdeeds, had had a part in the history of Freshman year.

There have been histories of music, of art, of nations and of races, of revolutions and of movements. Such tales as these we have known but too well in classroom and lecture hall. They are old, old stories to our tutored ears and having gained our knowledge of them we have lost our interest. There is one history, however, which cannot be classified except with itself. It has to do neither with the throbbing of stringed instruments in the night air nor the tap of chisel on marble. It cannot deal with the whole of one nation or race for it is concerned with fractions of many nations and many races. No wild upheaval is recorded in its pages, it tells of no movement set on foot to make tremble the walls of tradition. The History of the Sophomore year of 1916 is something new and strange, something unheard of. It is the history of a flow. With the spirits of youth—at least we hope it was youth—the class flowed undisturbed from baccalaureate to commencement.

The day was Wednesday, the twenty-fourth of September. In clusters of fives and sixes, bird-like, they clung to the bars of their newly acquired fence, and spoke knowingly of many things, for once they had been grubs, but now they had cast off their embryonic husks and emerged great gorgeous butterflies. It was thus that the sons of 1916 returned at the beginning of Sophomore year. The initial appearance was unpropitious. The gods of chance turned their faces from us and we struggled helpless against foreordained defeat. Of course it was mere hard luck that we obtained only one decision of the three bouts in wrestling, but in the rush we were unmitigatedly roasted. We charged unopposed from Durfee to Connecticut and should have been awarded the laurels of victory on the spot. The marshals, however, were biased and made us charge again. The Freshmen breathed an atmosphere of deceit from the Seniors who admonished them and quite unfairly stood in our way, even treating us roughly. Against this combination of deceit and perversion we could do nothing. The decision went to the class of 1917.

Still, the misfortunes of our first day were soon forgotten in the rush of duties. Having been worsted by the Freshmen in brutal physical combat, we contrived a diabolical revenge and sent Carrington, Coleman, Guernsey, Hadley, Tener, Tighe, Tittman and A. Wilson to extend our welcome to them in Dwight Hall, after which diplomatic stroke we considered them sufficiently cowed and proceeded forthwith to forget their existence.

The days passed merrily and in their due course. Hampton, while the warm weather lasted, became deeply addicted to nocturnal rambles wherein he communed, we trust, with nature. Caldwell developed a consuming interest in culture and could be seen almost any day staggering out of the library with an armful of choice and ancient books on damnonology or the art of after-dinner speaking in the twelfth century. Apart from this there was little that was distinctive in the class. But few of us had become such individuals that we could brazenly remain seated during the prayers in chapel, though, to be sure, there were developing evident leanings towards such a state of affairs. Some joined strange organizations, thereby gathering charms for their watch chains, and swearing eternal brotherhood against the vagaries of the world. Others, divesting themselves of all dignity, acquired a true scientific craving, and went in pursuit of the earthworm, blithely imitating the pitter patter of rain drops and crawling on all fours about the precincts of the campus. Almost any bright day brought forth half a hundred crouching figures that tapped persistently with the middle finger of the right hand, all for the keen pleasure of watching the disappointment depicted on the countenance of the earthworm when he crawled forth to find not raindrops, but a blinding sun. The first incident which disturbed our rustic quiet was the election of the Sophomore German committee. We met for the last time as a class in Osborn, and after what seemed like hours of fruitless balloting, expressed our choice. We chose with perspicacity, we chose with an eye to the delighting of the feminity which was to grace our German, and in the hands of Elmore Bostwick as chairman, Don Shepard as floor manager, with Wes Oler, Gil Porter and Alec Wilson composing the rest of the Committee, we placed the honor of the class as an organization of fussers.

Throughout the first month of the term the crew had been toiling unthanked and unnoticed about the oily sewers of New Haven harbor. Seth Low was rowing bow and Johnny Fitzpatrick No. 6. Every morning saw them depart with empty stomachs to sport with the cruel waves of the sound at that particularly witching hour of the day when everyone who is thinking of going to bed has gone, and those who are getting up have not yet done so. The idea seems to be that the early bird can catch the worm. In this case, however, the proverb was faulty, for when they rowed at Princeton towards the end of October the worm refused to be caught, and in spite of many game sprints Princeton won. A week later the first Adee with Bunker, Munson, Hume, Gaillard and Pratt, and a few inconsequential upperclassmen defeated the first Dunhams who had only three members of the class—Dickey, Ransom and Putnam.

About this time certain unmentionable Junior organizations began to prove a fertile source of conversation about the class. After two weeks of calling, forced conversation and free cigarettes, a large crowd gathered on the corner of the campus nearest Battell. Strange happenings took place behind the walls of the Sophomore dormitories, while maniacs upon the stroke of seven shrieked unintelligible ejaculations at ears that had become chilled with fear. A little later on Calcium Light Night, ninety-nine men of the Class of 1916, whose names have now become obscured in the forward march of time, were enrolled into five separate, rollicking brotherhoods.

Beneath this tinsel of recreation, however, as an undertone to the shrill cry of the aesthete on discovering a latent feature of beauty in Greek mythology and the hoarse croak of the philosopher solving the riddle of his own little world, and trying to apply his solution to the world at large, the football team, doggedly, though not brilliantly, was struggling onward. Finally, after its full share of ups and downs the team lined up against Princeton, and much to the dismay of the newspaper prophets, proceeded to outplay their opponents from start to finish, on two occasions just missing breaking a tie of 3-3 by a matter of inches. Otis Guernsey scored one goal. Alec Wilson was the star of the hour, his work at quarterback "was the most brilliant exhibition of football of the afternoon." A week later the team went down to defeat at the hands of Harvard in spite of a game struggle. In the final squad our class was represented by Guernsey, Wilson and Hubbard, who won their letters, and Miller, Malcom, Way, Roberts, Cowles and von Holt.

The month of November saw the Dramatic Association whipping its actors into shape for the Christmas trip, and Kin Tener, our manager, to be, calmly deciding momentous questions with a simple "yes" or "no." The presentation during the vacation was as usual a great success. In the cast 1916 was represented by Rowland Wilson, whose acting was "a very subtle and convincing study."

Meanwhile, the rest of the world was becoming famous or infamous as chance directed. Mudge, Elkin and Grant developed remarkable histrionic abilities, and out of the fullness of their brains concocted a shadowgraph performance which sent shivers of shame into the breasts of their classmates and drove Dame Grundy, shrieking in hysteria forever from the campus. The conception was hideous, the execution of the piece fiendishly realistic.

Don Malcom and Bob Coleman, better known perhaps as

Rob, were likewise seeking the limelight of fame. They had been down town one evening and were returning arm in arm and glowing internally with benefaction for mankind, towards the campus. It is unknown to this day whether it was Don or Rob that first brought forth the idea. At any rate, they both deserve credit for the brilliance of their imaginations. Of Chapel Street they constructed a green, grassy level field, of the passersby they made great Harvard football warriors, each with a ball which he was seeking to put across the bulldog's goal line in the distance where Riker's marked the intersection of Church Street. Don was a halfback and Rob an end. Rob was the first to spring to fame. In a swooping dive that set the imaginary stands screaming with delight, he tackled and brought to earth an elderly Italian. Don followed with a robust German. After that nationalities became indistinguishable, and it was only when the fallen figures numbered forty or more that Don remarked to Rob on the lateness of the hour, and they hastened into the sacred grounds of the campus where none of the unelite durst follow, just ninety feet ahead of the leader of a hungry mob.

So the time rolled itself onward to the semi-annual examinations, a feature new in the Yalensian calendar. After much desperate ruffling of hair and muttering of curses we emerged from one slough of despond. The faculty in a moment of generosity had decreed three days of freedom for the celebration of the Promenade, and happy in the anticipation of the results of this unwonted softness of heart we were enfolded deliciously into the lap of silkiness and the whirl of feminine festivities.

On Washington's Birthday we continued in the path blazed the year before by 1915, and refused to meet the Freshmen in the usual vulgar rush in which we were armed with canes. Instead, as twilight was merging into dark and the long shadows from Vanderbilt disappeared on the background of soft wet snow of the campus, we crept forth from our habitations to demolish the forces of the Freshmen. With aching fingers we moulded balls of ice and hurled them at the windows of Wright. In a moment all was chaos. For an hour war raged, favor first leaning to one side, then to the other, but at the last we emerged triumphant over the forces of 1917.

During the course of the winter, Hockey was given its place amongst the most important of the minor sports by the building of an artificial ice rink, but the team was handicapped for the season by the lateness of its completion. In spite, therefore, of the fact that Yale enjoyed the services of Aldrich, Sproul, Washburn, Dickey and Burgess it was defeated by both Harvard and Princeton. The swimming team, on the other hand, enjoyed one of the most successful seasons in the history of the League. Yale, with the aid of von Holt, Howe, Fitzpatrick and Symington, won the championship.

In the field of letters our class shone as a star to men. In the fall Horehow and Smith were added to the News board. Towards the middle of the year, Hadley and Murphy argued brilliantly with the best of the debaters. Lewis Bredin and Clem Ripley made the Record board in the very beginning of the fall term, Downey and Buck were taken on in the spring. Doc Walker, Curt Munson and Dave Hamilton astounded the world and broke all records in their phenomenal struggle for places on the board of the Yale Literary Magazine. The run was neck and neck, while the remainder of an unusually large field followed not far behind.

About this time George Haven had a birthday! Now we are well aware that birthdays are not such rare events in human affairs that any one may be mentioned as an exceptional occurrence. Now and then we all have them. It is the natural lot of mankind to have anniversaries, and every one in his lifetime may be led to expect at least one twenty-first birthday.

OMEGA

INNOCENCE

Hence the reader of this account may be at some loss to justify the mention of a natal day simply because it is the twenty-first, and has nothing whatsoever to do with George Washington, Lincoln, or even Jeanne D'Arc. At the beginning of this tale, however, we likened the history of Sophomore year to a flow and it is necessary at least to try and justify that simile. Hence we say George Haven had a birthday.

Thus the days came, passed and were forgotten. The New York commuters returned regularly on the milk train. The New Haven dancers wore out their pumps upon the floors of the Lawn Club. The rest of us attended the highest class moving picture shows and the most elite vaudeville. Elm Street crossing was black with slush and mud. Occasionally a ray of sunlight slanted down on the pea-green domes of Phelps. Otherwise all was murky. In the midst of this desolation we turned from our duties with heroic self abnegation and elected Dan Elkin to compete for managership of the crew, Harry Crocker for baseball and Huntie Lyman for track, and after this period of fitful awakening relapsed once more into the usual late winter dormancy.

With the end of the Promenade came the beginning of work for the crews. Yale's coaching system had been revised and with the incentive this offered an exceptionally large number of candidates made their appearance. The first event to break the routine of training was the Spring Regatta. The class crew, composed of Hume, Sanderson, Munson, Stauffer, Dickey, Shepard, Howe, Newton and Pratt, went down to defeat before the far heavier Junior boat, though they managed after a close struggle to nose out the Senior crew. Then in quick succession came the Henley regatta at Philadelphia with Johnny Fitzpatrick rowing six, and a week later the triangular regatta at Ithaca against Cornell and Princeton, where 1916 was represented by Seth Low and Allan McLane. This marked the end of the preliminary training and the beginning of the serious work for the Harvard race in June.

Towards the middle of May, as a class, we clung to the grilled fence of Berkeley Oval and watched a strange spectacle, the most extraordinary perhaps that was ever seen there. Our friends the Juniors who should have led us by their noble precept into the ways of righteousness and conservatism, had become imbued with the idea of reform, and sought to mitigate the horrors of Tap Day by holding the celebration on the Oval, away from the eyes of the curious world of the campus. They succeeded in having themselves tapped in the place of their choosing, and incidentally in receiving a glaring light of publicity, the like of which had never before been known.

Meantime, Lyman, Tittman, Guernsey and E. R. Wilson had been circulating secretly about the class, and thanks to their efforts, in the very end of May the campus blossomed into rejuvenated hilarity, and we met to celebrate the gaieties of Omega Lambda Chi. Though the thought of examinations was heavy upon us, for some at least the day was not a fruitless occasion.

The baseball team meanwhile was giving its best for the University. During Easter vacation it broke even on the games played with the aid of Dud Mudge, Pie Way and Rolly Vaughn. From then on it proceeded with varying success. Things looked bright for a triumphant termination of the season. Harvard had been vanquished conclusively, Yale and Princeton had one more game to play. Then in the very last heart-breaking moment, Princeton won with one lone hit.

The track team had been working with its usual spirit. The spring meet promised much for the success of the later events nor did the fulfillment in any way disappoint the promise. In the big meets Yale was supreme. Princeton was defeated by a score of 87 2-5 to 16 3-5 with the aid of Ricketts, Cowles, Oler, Hampton, Johnstone and Buck. In the Harvard meet Ricketts, Oler, Johnstone and Hampton scored, helping to win by a margin of 66½ to 37½. The three last men won their letter.

The last official activity of the Class was the gathering on the campus in the early days of June to deliver over our fence into the hands of the oncoming class. Curt Munson with some difficulty stood upon a table and told the precocious infants of the Class of 1917 just exactly what we of 1913 thought of them. Then the ceremony being concluded we adjourned to our rooms and to the completion of the final examinations.

This year, however, was to mark our entry into the real activity of college life with a fitting climax to so auspicious an occasion. From the time of the Cornell disaster the crew had been working amidst an atmosphere of questioning from the college at large. There did not seem much more possibility of defeating Harvard than there had been in the six preceding years. It was, therefore, with the added thrill of unexpected-ness that we saw or rather were told of the victory of Yale by a matter of inches. All honor to us that we contributed Seth Low and Allan McLane to the most famous crew in the history of Yale rowing.

Thus we flowed through our trials and emerged wiser if not better mortals.

WHAT'S THE DOPE?

It was on the thirtieth of September that we gathered together from far and near; into the Oval we flocked from the cactus forests of Texas and ukalele groves of Hawaii, from the skyless canyons of New York and the remote places of New Haven. For the first time in our history we found ourselves an architectural unit, set apart; and there was only Tute to watch over us. We felt ever so much more than a year older and wiser when we realized that we were mere spectators in the festivities of the first night; but the other rites of the starting of the year were the same: there were a few days of handshaking and "have-a-good-time-ing" — (a never failing source of material for the Record)—a season of untangling chairs from the tables and sorting pictures from rugs; a time of baffling the best efforts of the Dean's office and the architects of Osborn by rediscovering our courses for the year. Then we were off as if the Summer vacation had been only a Sunday jaunt. But there were a few changes: a few hitherto unseen phenomena appeared among us such as the General's smile and salute; and some old faces were missing. Connie Woehler, for instance, had left Yale to fight for Vaterland.

Whatever may have been the custom back in the days when Freshmen paled at the prospect of examinations, we surely did not take our ease in Junior year. In fact, even before the various preliminary rites above-mentioned took place, some of our number were hard at work. Among the football braves, Wilson, von Holt, Guernsey, Taylor, Way, Roberts, Miller and Washburn were conspicuous warriors, while Carrington, in his capacity of Assistant Manager, kept them properly clothed and fed. The old wooden stands were serving their last term, and in them we cheered and stamped and sang and shivered and watched, while the team piled up seven victories out of eight games. Then we followed to Princeton, whence we returned to our Elms rejoicing, wearing in our hats tufts of Tiger fur which the first three of the warriors above-mentioned had helped to capture. Meanwhile the Bowl was nearing completion. It was opened for the first time on the occasion of the Harvard game, though fate decreed that the real christening be postponed until our Senior year. Alec Wilson's work was one of the few bright spots of the game. In fact, his performance throughout the year marked him as the unanimous choice for the next captain, and also put him on Walter Camp's third All-American eleven.

Football was, par excellence, the ruling passion of the Fall term. But we were represented by skilled and talented performers in every act of the college vaudeville. Anyone who watched the Fall regatta must have noticed, interspersed in the three 'varsity boats, such expert oar-wielders as Seth Low, Bob Munson, Diekey, Sanderson, Ransom and Hume, not to mention the incomparable oyster-stake dodgers, McLane and Pratt. Scant-clad Juniors could be seen of an afternoon clambering up the precipitous sides of West Rock in emulation of Pheidippides. (Classical scholars and partakers of T. & B. are expected to understand the reference without aid of encyclopedia.) Platt, Gulliver and Young were rewarded by finding places on the University team in the Intercollegiate run. Whatever tribulations the various glee club trials furnished to others they had no terrors for Bostwick, Chappell, Black and Jessup. We are not told what happened on the trip during the intervals between the concerts (which opened the eyes and ears of the citizens of Buffalo and points West)—but rumors have been various. Vacations are not, however, within our province. On the Mandolin Club, Clarke, Sid Miller, F. D. Downey and Tom Hapgood survived the final cut. In the subsequent elections Bostwick and Miller were chosen leaders and Chappell and Downey recorders of their respective arms of the service, while it was decreed that Anderson should, in the future, look up trains and secure lucre. Meanwhile, still others were following the lure of the footlights. To Larry Tighe it was all one whether he inspired News heelers with awe or audiences with admiration. Dave Hamilton broke so many hearts among the student body that the Dean registered a solemn and secret oath that he would give him but one more chance to charm. "Whisky" Wilson was scarcely less captivating; while Harry Crocker proved that our versatile class can turn out actors as well as actresses. It is whispered abroad that a certain seaman was kidnapped from the navy and draughted into the army, where he did noble service as a guardsman, armed with a pike: a low, but not a menial task. Our influence was meanwhile felt in the forensic world. In the Syracuse debate the Yale victory was largely due to the heart-felt arguments and passionate appeals with which Gardiner Murphy denounced national prohibition. Early in the Fall term we found time to visit the haunts of our boyhood; many were the stairs we climbed and reclinbed in the Sophomore dormitories in search of edifying conversations and Yale types; many the memories we revived and many were the appeals to Rosey and Ned Howe, the Castor and Pollux of all good dopesters. The curriculum itself was not devoid of excitement, intellectual and otherwise. The dry-cut system devised in economics, a beautiful application of that very doctrine of economic efficiency; the bi-weekly promise of a lantern-slide lecture and a tour of Peabody: the frantic Friday search for specific appeal and range of gesture down titanic glooms of chasmed thought; all helped to make the days slip by until rumblings from the dean's office about double cuts made us wonder what was going to happen—and then the Christmas vacation burst upon us.

We returned to find mid-years uncomfortably close. The floor of the post-office was strewn with postal cards guaranteeing us safe passage through any hostile course in the catalogue. The mimeographed Digest stalked abroad from its Whitlockian den, seeking by whom it might be devoured. Then the examinations themselves were given to us in doses of one or two a day. But their sting, if they left any, was soon forgotten in the gaiety of the Prom. Bostwick and his valiant henchmen, Porter, Carrington, Hampton, Wilson, Crocker, Shepard and Tener, assisted by a few Sheff additions, comprised the committee. The class exhibited remarkable taste in femininity, with the result that such a dazzling assembly congregated in New Haven from all points of our fair country that the like, we fear, will never be seen again! Avaunt, pale care: away, text-books and literal translations; to the darkness of bureau drawers ye soft collars! This was a time—all too brief—a time of music, of song, of drama. Now did the stars and the university catalogue stop in their courses to "let the dance go on." But the best of things end,—which seems to be the only logical reason for the ending of the Prom festivities—and soon the world slipped back into its grooving. After bunya-bunyas come wadi-wadis, and the class once more took up its weapons with a will. Never was known such a wave of prosperity: industry thrived: intellect blossomed. In the Gymnasium a keen sighted observer might, almost any day, catch a glimpse of Murray Chism twinkling in aerial evolutions somewhere over the tumbling mat, in an act which won him first place in that coveted event in the intercollegiates, and did much toward giving his team the championship. He was reëlected captain for the next year. In the tank, von Holt was practicing on the enemies of Yale the tactics which he had learned from his many encounters with deep-sea sharks in Honolulu bay. The exact number of drownings to his credit is not reported: but he was chosen for the all-collegiate water-polo team, and elected captain of the Yale team for 1915-1916. On the ice, Burgess and Dickey were our representatives with the University stick-artists and worshippers of Puck: the former was elected captain for the next season: Otis was chosen manager. Meanwhile Howe's hardies were hammering out a place for themselves near the top of the class hockey teams. The literary life of the college was now beginning to find leaders among us. Ross Proctor, elected chairman of the News, began to cast a worried look abroad for editorial subjects: after a hot race and violent struggle—a spectacle much enjoyed by Curt Munson — Doc Walker's Lit score was ratified by the class and he entered upon the duties of chairman, with Dave Hamilton close behind. Downey was proclaimed Dean of the Droolers by the Recording Owl; and Halstead fell heir to the topmost seat at the Councilboard of the Courant (illustrated). Graves was chosen trade-ad editor. In this whirl of academic affairs the troubles of the nation were not forgotten. The country was undecided as to the advisability of an increase of the army and navy; Morris Hadley and Gardner

Murphy strove to lift her out of the mire of doubt, but as they espoused different sides of the question and as each won his case, the country was not greatly aided; though it was in this debate that Yale won the championship from Harvard and Princeton. The Debating association subsequently elected Morris Hadley president: an action which was promptly and closely copied by our delegation of Phi Beta Kappa.

The spring vacation was decidedly not all that the name implies, for it was ushered in by one of the heaviest snow-storms of the year. If anyone thirsts for a graphic description of the snow-bound race which was rowed during this vacation on the Schuylkill, he is respectfully referred to Frank (just boat-house Frank; if he has a last name nobody has even heard it). Frank will start much after this manner: "Now say, let me tell you. Snow? By ——" and so on, until he has both Yale crews safely over the line, each two lengths ahead of its Pennsylvania rival. And if he mentions names, you will find out that Seth Low rowed in the University crew and Bob Munson in the Junior, and that to Allan McLane and Charlie Pratt belongs the credit of safely piloting their respective shells between bothersome icebergs and around occasional glaciers.

But at last grass took the place of ice on the oval; the sun-dial was no longer a frozen mockery; the gay earthworm answered the rap-rap of the facetious Junior; Roly Vaughn crept out of the baseball cage, and went on to the field, in spite of the fact that he saw his shadow; the spring term, and spring itself, had come! With it came the three-ringed circus of major sports. No sooner would we be intent upon watching Wes Oler making ready to clear six feet or so, than Pie's marvelous winding-up would rivet our attention to the diamond; and, on one occasion we were just comfortably settled at a baseball game when we had to be up and off by jitney and trolley car to Lake Whitney to witness the Spring regatta. It was on that day that our class crew won handily from the sophomores; but the officials objected to the Tirpitzian policy put into effect by Howard Putnam, and the race was rowed again, with a less satisfactory result. It was then, too, that Sam Gaillard displayed an ability to row with one eye over each shoulder, which captured for him the Single Scull title, and, later on, enabled him to defeat the Harvard disciple of this sport on the Charles. On that day, too, did Seth Low (unhoped-for sight) appear in a full beard! But this triumph was somewhat dimmed, alas, owing to the fact that he was bearded "gregarious, in a herd" with some seventeen other 'Varsity seamen. The account that the crew gave of itself later on is too famous to need comment.

MARKS FALL
AGAIN

At Princeton, Cornell and Princeton acknowledged our naval supremacy,—and anyone who saw Allan McLane at the finish of the race on the Thames cannot be in any doubt as to the outcome of the battle with Harvard. Seth Low and Allan McLane, Bob Munson and Charlie Pratt were at their old posts in the 'varsity and second boats respectively. After the race Low was unanimously added to our company of Captains, while Dan Elkin removed the "Asst." from his former title and became manager.

In baseball the elevation of Pie's leg as he delivered curly ones over the inside corner was a miracle that cost us many a ride or walk to Yale field during that spring. It was something we had to see. It was too, a sight for which opposing batters paid heavily—especially those of Old Nassau. Another attraction at the field was the spectacle of Harry Crocker, in assistant-managerial shirt-sleeves, chasing the foul-tips that cleared the stands and bumped into the unknown beyond. Rolly Vaughn came back into form for the championship series; and it was such incidents as his three-bagger in the "lucky seventh" of the Harvard game that made that series worth while.

To return to the other ring of the circus, where we left Wes Oler about to start the high jump at six feet: this height was enough to give him the event at Princeton; whereupon, still not content, he glanced at the broad-jump pit, said he thought that he had recollections of having seen something of that kind before, and straightway took a leap at right angles to his usual direction which added another five points to Yale's score.

CLASS TEAM—1915

Arkie Hampton scored in the same event; while Johnny Johnstone in the pole vault and Ricketts in the hundred contributed likewise to the downfall of Princeton. In the Harvard meet our delegation substantially repeated its performance. Perhaps the most notable feature of the season was Wes Oler's high jump in the intercollegiates, in which he broke the intercollegiate record by clearing six feet, four and one-half inches. He was chosen to lead the team for the next year.

Every good circus has its side shows, and this one offers no exception. Imported direct from Scotland, behold our heroes of the links—Sid Farnsworth, Dick Pierce and Ham Gardner; and the greatest of these is Ham Gardner. Watch him as he waves his stick twice or thrice majestically around his head, and Presto, gentlemen, he has won the University title and makes off for fresh woods and golf-links new. But hark! What signifies that flutter of wings and crying of birds in distress? Yonder are our militarists, slaughtering clay pigeons for the honor of the gun team; and if a bird escapes the fusillade of Neil Taylor it is sure to fall before one or the other barrels of Sterl Halstead's well-aimed piece. In a more peaceful frame of mind, many of our number were occupied at the tennis courts, and Tom Hapgood made a place on the University team in the Intercollegiates. "Bull" Roberts and his company of Lacrosse players introduced a sport that had passed away from Yale sometime back in the dim ages.

DEBUT

While athletics flourished art, too, blossomed. The Drama made its appearance among us, and we heard Thaos bellow blank verse to picturesque (if not Kellersque) primitive head-hunters, where once Alec Wilson had shouted cryptic signals to more modern warriors. Near the end of the term—so near, in fact, that many of us had already declared summer vacation—the Campus was the scene of “Harold”; Dave Hamilton so transcended the expectations of even the Dean that the far above-mentioned oath of the latter took effect in the form of a much discussed edict which is, perhaps, treated under Senior year. Hamilton was elected to succeed Tuttle as president of “Lit”?

Dramat; the long cloak of honest Steve Davenport fell upon the shoulders of Kin Tener and reached almost to his knees; while Baldy Allen was chosen to go before the company of maskers with trumpet and poster. This term saw Johnny Johnstone safely installed as President of Dwight Hall; and the class exhibited its remarkably keen powers of discrimination in choosing Harry Crocker winner of the Gordon Brown Memorial.

Having thus settled the weightier affairs of college life let us take umbrellas, rain coats, and chainmail, and venture into the Oval. The reports that Tute kept a collapsible ark under his bed, ready for any sudden emergency, are founded on reason, but seem to lack adequate substantiation in fact. Such foresight would have been commendable; for on one occasion the water hurled out of windows from every receptacle from paper bags to uprooted bath-tubs would have terrified Noah himself. The deluge attracted the attention of a crowd of interested citizens, until a neatly directed Moran's box drove into their dampened heads the fact that spectators spectated at their own risk. Bill Kallman's fire-escape was always adorned with an assortment of crockery, and it was a dry day that the sight-seeing American Express Wagon rattled under his window undamaged by a cloudburst. Red Burnett so mistrusted us that he would not ride around the Oval without first donning oil-skins—a precaution which on at least one occasion proved to be exceedingly well-taken. The lawn-sprinkler proved to be a valuable asset to our domain. Its uses were various; perhaps its most unique application was as concealed artillery. The details of the scheme were worked out with great ingenuity—from the sprinkler hidden in the hedge under the fence, to the final release of the distant kink and the discomfiture of the unsuspecting victim, whose attitude was not unlike that of a man who sits unawares on a beehive. Some sports were transplanted from our former abodes on the campus; bicycle races, for instance, flourished among us again. The bicycle record around the Oval was never committed to the archives, and seems to have passed from the memory of man. The only available tradition puts it at three broken spokes and a pair of bent handle bars, attributed to Closson. As for power machines, the sears still worn by Norm Finch and Jess James proclaim these two the champion tandem-smashers-into-Baker-electrics—a title which most of us will grant without protest.

Those who date the first military activity at Yale with our Senior year are mistaken by several months. Why our kingdom was invaded is still a question for future historians; but invaded it was and with all the accessories of modern warfare, including trenches. We mobilized. The military experts of the class found a drum, two swords, guns, a horse pistol, Harry Crocker and a pick-axe. Raw material thronged to the standard of Arkie Hampton, recruiting officer, and the army stormed the trench. Private Booth fell on the parapet; Field Marshal Eckman was left impaled in the entanglement; but the trench was won. It was real war; three six-inch guns—(from the arsenal of the city department of street drains)—three six-inch guns were captured; and not the least realistic touch was the special photographic staff of the Courant, Don Fitts and Walt Freeman, following close upon the heels of the victors. Rumors have been rampant concerning training in another branch of the service. Bob Munson organized a naval force for the express purpose of teaching Wash Porter the finer points of sailing. It was Wash's debut, and was duly celebrated with such effect that it took this child of Neptune more time than it should have to get back his "land legs" even after the voyage was over. Another incident in the nautical branch of the service was the feat of Commodore Gil Porter, who managed to steer Frank's pet shell exactly between two channels, thereby giving his crew practice in leaving a sinking ship in due order and cold water. The spectacle was thoroughly enjoyed by the female element of the native population.

There must be clouds even on the brightest day; a history must record the vices as well as the virtues of those within its scope. It is with deepest regret that we heard of, and with deeper regret (if possible) that we chronicle the case of Professor Johnson vs. Smith—for nothing less reprehensible than house-breaking and theft of furniture. In vain did the defendant ring his private bell to summon aid from Woodbridge Hall. But let us drown our sorrows by plunging headlong into Omega Lambda Chi—"an alcoholiday," to quote the News, "when everybody was the fool, and all were on the laughing side." A Keystone comedy, the Johnson-Willard fight, Fred Stone, and a Tug of war, were the events around which clustered deeds of daring and hilarity which marked May eleventh with red ink. An occasion of even greater mirth was the class party—our first,—at the Taft a week later. The "Spring Chicken" cackled in anticipation: even the black-edged announcement of a per capita direct tax did not keep us from turning out to the Taft to the last man. Even "Art" was there—(last name unknown. He was labelled simply, "Call me Art)"—"Art" whose winning smile quite captivated the imported Mexican charmer, Madame Hunyadi-Janos. Talent from all over the world—Hawaii, famous Milwaukee, and lands unknown, gave us such a brilliant entertainment that even the most nervous forgot Rosey's lists. Who could mourn that he had not gone out for football instead of chess, while the inimitable Pie Way was drawing on his fund of shadowy stories? But after the party Rosey's signs were again hanging to every door; and small groups gathered and buzzed and melted away, only to gather once more. Then Tap day came and went and left everything much as it had been long before, except that we went without our hats. And this was an outward and visible sign that Junior year was well behind us—that we were about to enter, very soon, into the last stage of our college course. We were eager to become seniors—even though the road lay through final examinations—; and yet, it was perhaps with some feeling of regret that we cast a look backward. For those were crowded days, those spring days of Junior year. They were filled with all the pleasures that go to make spring terms the best; but we had found new and broader interests than those we had enjoyed in either of the two preceding years; we knew each other better; we knew Yale better.

The whole year was, perhaps, to many of us, the brightest of any of the four. To all of us it must have been a full year, a year worth living and worth remembering. Each of us lived it in his own particular way; each of us must have his own peculiar memories of it—memories so fine-woven that a pen can only tatter them in any vain attempt to set them down. In view of this, to write anything like a true history of Junior year is hopelessly impossible: there are as many histories as there are men in the class. This account can pretend to be only a delving here and there into the things that interested most of us. In one sense, it belongs to the class—is everybody's; in a far truer sense it belongs to nobody, is no man's. It is, at best, a sort of orphan history, taken from the asylum of black-bound volumes of the News. It has served its purpose if an occasional reader, glancing over its pages, is thereby tempted to spend an idle moment or two reconstructing in his mind another history,—his own—of Junior year.

Louis Cappel Zahner

SENIOR YEAR

SENIOR YEAR

The summer before our last and brightest was itself unusual, thanks to the people of the Pacific coast. Perhaps half the class accepted the tempting invitation to improve their minds on a transcontinental journey, and to look over the wonders of the world assembled at its close. They returned with many new friends and experiences. Some of them actually visited the expositions, though the majority seems to have surveyed them from a height like Napoleon at Moscow. In the stories of the returning pilgrims we have heard,—the less fortunate of us,—about everything but these affairs, which we had childishly supposed were the cause of the pilgrimage. We were wrong: they were only the excuse. As to what they were the excuse for, it is impossible to go into very great detail. We have heard of a snake dance joined in by the President around the lobby of a leading San Francisco hotel: Chat-Taylor discovered a new way of catching lagooms at Del Monte: W. R. Proctor's daring and successful impersonation of Phelps Putnam forms a small chapter of a long story. The transcontinental railways were as full of your classmates as the Friday Milk: their exploits could be published only, if at all, in twenty or more volumes.

But while this history was being made, five of the boys were on the other side of the world, in France, dressed up in khaki and spiral puttees, in the service of the Ambulance Corps. The Munson brothers, Knight Cowles, Walter Hellier and Victor Bush Caldwell were the gallant young chauffeurs. Curtis developed a fondness for the French peasantry and has a picture to prove it. The rumor spread that Walter had been blown up, Ford and all, by a German shell, but though a little late in getting back, he appeared undamaged and unchanged, except for his upper lip. In this connection Stewart Bullivant's luxuriant display, so aptly compared to the rear view of a sprinkling cart, deserves mention. In such cases it is usually hard to recognize the mustache; this time, however, it was Stew that was hard to find.

The rest of us returned more or less apologetically from prosaic summers to settle down to the hardship of twelve hours a week and Chapel. Senior year was on. A deep bellow, distinguishable from among the sweet piping of the other choristers made it certain that Bill Kallman was back and in good form, while later in the day an inspired tenor, in that well known Bacchic strain of "drunk last night . . .," heard so often on the road home from Mory's, left no question about Bos Bostwick's being among us, though he turned out on investigation to be in the School of Music. The Dean sent cards to the chosen, to the effect that he was still doing business between the usual hours; in a day it was as though we had never been to France or Frisco or Fordyce.

The early football games were dismal on the whole, but a certain amount of comic relief was furnished by our cheerleaders, McLane, Proctor, Elkin and Low, especially Seth, whose introduction of Russian Ballet figures into the final "Yale" met with great success. Pavlowa herself might have been jealous. His wrist motion, too, showed the previous education of those members under Guy Nickalls. Bos as song leader could not keep up the pace like his predecessor Henney Keep, and was finally forced to give up all but the arm motion. He found it hard, later, to lead a cheer with a ten-inch pipe in mouth. Then when the Springfield boys began turning hand springs and back flips our humiliation was complete. It was suggested that Red Elkin be taught to do these tricks, for our sake and that of his figure, but he could not be persuaded.

New football songs came from Chappell, Norm Finch, Lewy Miller and Don Fitts; Eli's day fitted the Saturday of the Princeton game as if it had been written for the occasion. At the Brown Game the Whiffenpoofs enacted another solemn allegory, in which F. M. Hampton rose far above his usual level. Morgan Spiegle made an impatient corpse, coming to life twice before any of the others.

During the fall the University had been invaded by a secret society of enormous extent and power, known as the Ancient and Honorable Order of the Little Yellow dogs. Dan Collier Elkin is believed to be the original Little Yellow Dog for the New England States, sent as Prime Canus Extraordinary from Kennel 116 of Lancaster, Kentucky. It was supposed by enterprising agents of the New Haven dailies that this organization was a Yale and not a national affair, and that it had for its purpose the idea of arousing football spirit during the sad reverses of the season. Although it is absolutely impossible to reveal the true nature of the society's aims, still it is safe to deny any truth for this report. The latest census shows a total of some eight thousand fifty-two dogs.

Nearly as surprising as this in its extent, was the enlistment in the Yale Battery. Although the Battery is not strictly a 1916 affair, it deserves mention on account of the vital part that some of our classmates took in its foundation and early history. Morris Hadley, whose militarism would shock our Bryanites and intellectual preparationists, might be held personally responsible for the whole movement. Reg Field, Cal Littlefield, Stew Bullivant, Mel Cary, Marcus Morton, Dus

Sanderson and Allan McLane are prominent for one reason or another. One valuable part of being a member that has been realized by Curt Munson and others, but not yet given as one of the reasons for the battery, is the convenience of the uniform for masquerade affairs. The Lawn Club looked several times like the ball room of an army post.

When the Princeton game came along, after the dismal weeks of the preliminary season, there were plenty of us who refused to stake even our hopes on the outcome: but Otis Guernsey's long range attack on the Princeton goal,—from the fifty-four yard line,—altered matters in an instant. Nobody would have been afraid to be confident after the first quarter. Then when Pi scooped up the neglected pigskin, and frolicked lightly across the line with it like a playful lamb, there was no doubt about its being another hard luck story for Princeton.

Harvard may well be passed over quickly, noting only that Bull Roberts and Chat-Taylor got their Y's. It was on the night of the game that Bostwick, Haven, Anderson and Smith became honorary members of the Pen and Pencil Club. Shortly after the season the Rumhounds sprang into being, and played several hard-fought and well-lost games. Captain Littlefield directed the attack. Johnny Johnstone won distinction at quarterback. However, he is responsible for one of the defeats,—in part,—on account of a punt which was received by the Freshmen on the Rumhound two-yard line. It had plenty of height, however, and the ends had no trouble in getting under it as soon as they saw it at all. Cap Higbee and Fat Levy were the mainstays of the line, while Sam Gaillard played a dashing game at end. After Ira Washburn got into the spirit of the game all signals but his were discarded. Although the Rumbounds had an unsuccessful season, each hound enjoyed himself, and it is hoped that there will be future generations, even if class football never gets officially organized.

It was about this time that the class lost forever its beloved member Charles Morgan Spiegle, getting in return Charley Aldrich, who is not, as far as anyone can yet discover, any particular improvement on his predecessor. The exchange was made with due ceremony. The attic of the Pratt University club was brightly lit; on the table reposed a keg of beer; Grant in golf trousers, silk stockings and a cutaway announced, while G. E. Porter and D. O. Stewart with Al between them formed the receiving line. "The Duke is dead, long live the Duke"; Aldrich was received as though he had been with us always; a good time was had by all.

After this unusual episode, Larry Lloyd, Chuck Fagan and Ira Washburn surprised us by becoming the owners of a spirited piece of horseflesh, in return for the sum of ten dollars. This price will no longer seem high when it is remembered that a wagon was thrown in with the noble animal. They bought him out of pity on finding him stuck in a snow drift, downhearted and disgusted with life, and not enjoying the good opinion of his master, who seemed anxious to get rid of him. They expect to use Burgess,—for that is his name,—as a means of conveyance to and from the baseball games. Larry, however, says that he does not think he will be able to use Burgess in this way on account of being on mark probation. By tying barrel staves onto the wheels of Burgess's barouche the equipage was adapted to the unusually hard winter. There were other pets in the class during the year; John McLennan had two love birds, Sid Miller a canary, while Paul Phoenix and Dan Willard are said to have kept gold fish in an effort at homely cheer in the college room. Bull Roberts tried enlivening things with a kettle drum, which had to be stolen before relief was obtained for the rest of the entry.

Just as life at Yale was beginning to drag Otis Guernsey announced a special excursion to New York, with himself as local manager. No one who went will forget the party,—how Harry Crocker got Caruso a chair,—how Aldrich and Grant led the singing at supper,—and especially how it felt to find a sleeper on the milk where an international slum had been expected. It was without any doubt an historic occasion.

Then, almost before we had taken stock of the swift gliding associated with the college year, it was Christmas vacation. The Dramat set out with an Ideal Husband, in which Nineteen Sixteen was represented by three butlers, a dowager and one gentleman, in the persons of Messrs. Lyman, Elkin, Wilson, Enright (replaced by Longstreth), and Hamilton, respectively.

"The seasons come, the seasons go;
The earth is green or white with snow."

Bostwick and Henry Anderson took the Musical Clubs on a southwesterly trip, while Bunny Burgess and his hockey team went to Pittsburgh. It was there that an enthusiastic spectator, leaning over the boards, did away with his tooth leaving the cavity so noticeable on his return. The Yale audience was criticized for its attitude at the Princeton games, but it never did anything like that.

The lull before examinations seems to have been uneventful; at this time those who have not gone to the ant, go to the tutor, and learn other ways to be wise. When the smoke of battle cleared it was found that George Haven had repulsed every counter attack of the authorities, and was our fourth living graduate. This was duly celebrated with a party at Mory's,—positively the last,—and followed the next week by two more. George then began work in New York.

At the Prom the class was well represented, both with and without, in spite of the fact that Seth Low, Allan McLane, Bob Munson, Cepe Smith and Louis Bredin went to the Adirondacks on a health trip. Titty went with them, and gave lessons in snow shoeing. A great many things happened during Prom time, but it would be unfair in many ways to mention most of them. The goal that Ira Washburn shot in the Dartmouth Hockey game, in the third extra period, with all the girls watching, however, can be mentioned, and will be remembered up at Tuttle's, and other storehouses of Yale lore well into the next century. He made it from a few feet in front of the Yale goal, through the whole Dartmouth team. At the Prom itself, Dod Cassard is said to have been prominent though the reasons are withheld. When Montey Woolley arrived from Syracuse with a sprained ankle, he was met at the station by members of the Dramat in stovepipe hats, black whiskers and steel spectacles, who removed him to College Street Hall in a wagon, much to the amusement of New Haven and the Prom girls at the Taft, who were charmed with the playfulness of the undergraduate, and his picturesque ways, and undoubtedly were jealous for not having been met in the usual way themselves. Whether this ceremony was part of the advertising campaign in which the Dramat and the Musical clubs fought hard and with strategy for the dollars of Prom victims will never be known; anyhow the Dramat won in the struggle, either on this account, or because its billboards were a few feet larger. The cut-throat competition between these two organizations is one of the unpleasant facts of the year,—like the Harvard Game and the Eligibility Question,—and the Dramat parts,—which have done enough damage without being introduced here.

The students of Metaphysical Poetry enjoyed a metaphysical banquet on the evening of the final Princeton hockey game, and their enthusiasm has done a great deal for a word which until lately has been under a cloud. It is not yet known in the class at large what metaphysics are, but suspicion has been allayed and curiosity aroused. The game afterward was perhaps more primitive in its appeal, perhaps too primitive, but it met with general approval. Aldrich, who has been out for the team since he decided to come to Yale from St. Paul's, got in at last. If the official had known about Morg's history, he might not have put him off for two minutes out of the three. The game was a good sequel to the one in the bowl.

The Yale Country Club, with its fine squash courts, billiard tables and bowling alleys, was welcomed heartily by the class. One of the events of the year was a twenty-four hour bowling match, in which Ham Gardner and Bill Wyer competed successfully. Other members have spent very nearly that length of time on the alleys, but will not admit it.

It had now come to the time for an established custom to be observed. Gil Porter was seen telegraphing and telephoning to points of interest along the Atlantic Coast, while Aldrich and Burgess acquired a stealthy look which we remembered having seen before. Arrangements were finally completed, and the team started at nine-thirty Friday morning, this time for Baltimore instead of Atlantic City. They all agree that taking this year and last, this made a total eclipse.

Baseball practice started in the same spirit as usual in spite of the difficulties; even Pie Way went in February. Captain Oler was confident about the Track Team, which had better winter conditions in the new track cage than any previous team, but it looked as though they would never get out doors on account of the snow which was three feet or so deep and fell regularly two days out of three. Seth Low, Allan McLane, Guy Nickalls and Red Elkin started the Crew season with the Crew Banquet, at which the doctrine of "fun and victory both" was preached and practiced, and justly recommended to the other sports.

These were some of the events of Senior year; how the class as a whole liked their last year is impossible to say. Each man likes to express sentiment in his own way, and it is even possible that there were those among us who felt little. But the majority had moments in which they wondered how they were going to do without the pleasures of athletics, friendship and curiosity which are the meaning of Yale.

FIFTY YEARS AGO AND NOW

FIFTY YEARS AGO AND NOW

I have been asked to set down some of my recollections of college life during my undergraduate years, 1869 to '73.

The interval is not quite half a century but the contrast between then and now is great as will be realized when I mention that then football was unknown, the winner of the DeForest Prize was a greater man in college estimation than the Captain of the Crew (Manager there was none) and a student was by law forbidden to be out of town over night without special permission from his division officer. This article of the Laws of Yale College was brought to my mind recently when I chanced to visit the railway station on a Friday afternoon at the height of the weekly ebullition whereby so much of the froth of the undergraduate world is drawn off, or levitates, to New York. I reckoned that as many students, courteously so called, went down for this week end as formerly in a year, and I recalled that I myself visited New York in term time but once during my four undergraduate years.

The body of laws referred to was a fairly liberal code, still retaining some theological flavor and overburdened with minute regulation of student-conduct, the residuum from the first formal code drawn up by President Clap in 1745. The original draft of these laws of 1745 is in the Archives of the University. It is a manuscript of perhaps twenty pages of rough paper, in a fair round hand and bound in a cover formed of two sheets of a school boy's copy book. It is written in English but the edition published for the use of the students is in Latin. It enumerates and punishes specifically every conceivable form of misconduct—beginning with denial of the inspiration of the Bible or any part thereof and an attempt on the life of the President or a Tutor, punishable by expulsion, down through sword play or practice with cudgels and many minor misdemeanors, as possession of gambling implements (including a backgammon board), failure to remove the hat within the prescribed distance from a college officer, until we reach absence from prayers punished by a fine of one penny. The ban upon backgammon remained in force for a hundred years.

President Clap's laws ordained that the Beadle should wait upon the President each morning soon after six of the clock for orders for the ringing of the bell. In the seventies it rang without presidential supervision to indicate each successive item of our daily routine. We rose, prayed, ate our meals and attended our recitations at 8, 11.30 and 5 by its clamorous command, and four times on Sunday it summoned us—to prayers, that is, morning and afternoon chapel and evening meeting, as also on Wednesday evening, the evening service not being obligatory. The student who was responsible for its punctual performance fifty-one times per week and received for his services tuition and a room under the bell, earned his pay. To the best of my recollection the bell ringer failed in his duty but once in four years.

The elective system forced the bell out of business and put the clock in its place—a striking improvement,—which has not resulted in "great irregularity on the part of the students in respect to their meals" as an influential member of the faculty gravely predicted. So unsafe is it to prophesy.

This machine-like regularity of student life, symbolized by the ringing of the bell, and its unity of purpose form the most marked features of contrast to life on the campus to-day. The flood of extra-curriculum activities had not overwhelmed us. The classes which for many years had not varied much from one hundred in number lived all together in the old brick row, and lived there all the time as already intimated. They therefore knew each other well and liked or disliked each other heartily. Most important influence of all, the whole class studied the same subjects through almost the entire course. The writer sat by the same man in class, who as it chanced had the same name and surname, three times a day for nearly four years. This unity in the classroom led to a competition in scholarship which is now impossible and was then a great incentive to study. Between the leading scholars of a class it often became intense and it was watched by the rank and file in its daily progress as men now watch athletic games from the bleachers. By reflex influence it affected the scholarship of the class generally. It was not the highest kind of a motive for study, but it served a useful purpose and did much to vivify the somewhat barren and lifeless course of study to which we were confined.

The curriculum had become too varied to admit of the old custom of assigning to a class a tutor who should continue with it for four years and teach everything in course, but in many branches instruction was not given by specialists.

PRINCETON

In the class before my own, circumstances made it convenient to assign the teaching of Political Economy to the senior professor of Latin. He frankly avowed to the class his lack of special knowledge of the subject and conducted the recitations for the most part by asking questions from the text book, with results like the following: "Jones" (reading from the book on the Effect of the Malthusian Theory) "is there then no remedy?" Jones rises and responds with fervor, also in the words of the book, "Thank God! There is!" and sits down.

In the following year Professor Sumner returned from study in Europe to take the chair of Political Economy, then first established, and we had the benefit of the early enthusiasm of the greatest of Yale's teachers. His influence over us was enormous. He did not convince men but he made them think. I have seen men gather outside at the close of a lecture on protection and shake their fists in each others' faces. Dean Wright and Professor Beers also began their teaching with our class to our great pleasure and profit.

In 1745 a student was examined for admission to college on a considerable amount of Latin and a little Arithmetic. Fifty years ago the number of required subjects and their quantity were nearly as great as now, but the examination was oral and not unduly stringent. A candidate entered Alumni Hall informally and sat at an octagonal table, some of which are still in use, and waited for an examiner to come his way. If he happened to be kept busy he might finish in half a day.

The only entrance examinations that I remember anything about are those in Latin Composition and the Analiasis. In the former Professor Thacher put a copy of Arnold's Latin Prose Composition before me opened at a certain page and told me to look over the exercises on that page without turning over the pages. He then turned to another candidate and when he returned I said the prescribed sentences. In the Analiasis I was examined by Professor Hadley. After a rather halting translation he asked me several grammatical questions, the last of which I was unable to answer. After waiting a reasonable time he moved away. Just then an idea occurred to me and I shouted the answer after him in a stentorian tone. He looked back and smiled, and I have always believed that I thereby escaped a condition.

Professor Hadley was a man of wide erudition and profound scholarship. His mind was brilliant, clear cut and lucid. He was an admirable teacher and his untimely death in 1871 was an irreparable loss. In his funeral address President Porter said that the Faculty would have had no hesitation in entrusting to him at any time the teaching of any subject in the curriculum.

In spite of the informality of entrance examinations conditions were freely bestowed and they were an immediate and heavy burden, for it was a rule that a student might not be admitted to recitations until he had made up his conditions. Special examinations were held weekly for removing conditions and it was the middle of the fall term before the last of the stragglers appeared in the class room. Thus those who most needed to get a good start in college work were seriously and often fatally handicapped.

Admission to college was not complete until the ceremony of matriculation had been performed. When this took place or of what it consisted I do not remember. The sole reminder of it at present is the "Matriculation Sermon" delivered by the President on the first Sunday of the college year. These rambling reminiscences and loosely stated comparisons between the past and the present might be continued indefinitely if space permitted. Any one who cares to make such comparisons in extensu can do so by reading "Four Years at Yale" by Lyman H. Bagg of '69, published in '71.

Let me rather pass per callum from the alpha to the omega of college life and say a word about Commencement. Then as now it was a dignified and enjoyable function. The procession wended its way to Center Church through crowds much admiring, as now, though it was not given to them to see the pomp of caps and gowns or to thrill before the majesty of the mace. At the church the ceremonies up to the conferring of degrees were conducted by the graduating class and were long drawn out, beginning with the Latin Salutatory. During the intermediate series of orations, philosophical and otherwise, dispute, colloquies and the like, the assembled company wandered in and out at will, seeking relief from the hot air of the pews and the platform under the shade of the superb elms that were the just pride of the city. The scene around the church resembled a lawn party and is stamped on the memory of many an old graduate, marred by no monument of ugliness like the Hotel Taft. When the valedictorian got up the crowds poured back and filled the house to suffocation, and then gladly adjourned to dinner and speeches at Alumni Hall.

The Commencement function as at present conducted is considered by good judges to be unsurpassed in dignity and impressiveness by any ceremony in the country. Its perfection of form and detail is due in great part to the administrative genius of the lamented Professor John C. Schwab, University Librarian. It serves the great purpose of impressing on the minds of the graduating class as they enter into the fellowship of the Alumni of the University a sense of the dignity and power of that fellowship, and sends them out of their play time into life with a realization of the value of their inheritance as sons of Yale.

The tradition of the Alumni, faint and elusive to the undergraduate, becomes definite when he receives his diploma, and as years pass has a culminative effect that is very powerful. To the undergraduate it is apt to be crystallized about some notable class. At present this is no doubt the class of '78 in which President Taft is the leading figure of a brilliant group typifying the best in Yale. In the seventies it was the class of '37, the only class that ever gave to the country a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, a Secretary of State and a President. Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite possessed all the substantial qualities that belong to the foremost judicial position in the world. Secretary William M. Evarts had the most acute legal mind of any lawyer of an epoch of great lawyers. Samuel J. Tilden is the only man ever elected to the presidency who has surrendered his title to the office from patriotic motives.

Mr. Tilden was a bachelor but the children and grandchildren of Evarts and Waite are Alumni of Yale. Mr. Evarts only of the three came frequently to New Haven and he for many years rarely missed a Commencement, where his after-dinner speech was looked forward to as the crowning event, for he was a master of epigram and repartee and esteemed the foremost wit as well as lawyer of his time. Among innumerable of his remembered sayings there may be cited his remark, concerning the tradition of Washington having once thrown a silver dollar across the Potomac, that "a dollar went much further then than now"; and his reply when an attempt was made to catch him napping at a dinner of the Harvard Medical School by calling on him without previous notice to speak of the coats of the stomach—that he was not prepared "since it had been his habit when attending a Harvard dinner to leave the coats of his stomach at home."

Mr. Tilden left college before graduation. He was a man of great wealth and there is the best authority for the statement that he made Yale his residuary legatee. But during the campaign in which he was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, ex-President Woolsey, who took no active part in politics, published a letter in which he spoke of Mr. Tilden as having "sought the Presidency with uncommon anxiety." The criticism offended Mr. Tilden and he changed his will, giving the residuary estate, amounting to several millions, to the City of New York for building the public library which stands on Fifth Avenue at Forty-second Street. The sentence above quoted may be reckoned as the most expensive ever spoken by a Yale man, since each word was worth about a million dollars.

OBITUARIES

JOHN CHRISTOPHER SCHWAB was a remarkable man. He possessed in high degree a large number of different qualities which are not often combined. He united personal charm with administrative efficiency, critical scholarship with judgment of practical affairs, responsibility in the conduct of his own business with interest in public service of every kind, scrupulous adherence to principle with large tolerance of the feelings of others.

During his college course he had already given proof of his worth. The Class of 1886, of which he was a member, contained an unusual number of strong men, and he was recognized as one of its leaders. He continued to show the same qualities of leadership in his graduate study and in his work of instruction. His book on The Confederate States of America has been pronounced by James Ford Rhodes a model of how economic history ought to be studied and written. But it was not until the time of the bicentennial celebration that the world recognized his extraordinary administrative power. Of the exercises on that occasion he was given general charge. He performed the complex duties incident to that trust in a way which commanded universal admiration. Seldom, if ever, has so difficult a position been filled in a way to satisfy every one so well.

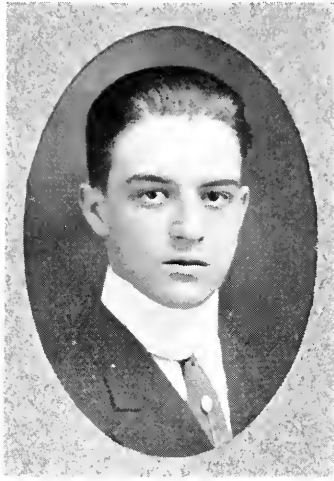

A more permanent field for the exercise of his administrative ability was found when he was called upon to succeed Addison Van Name in the headship of the Yale University Library. The ten years during which Mr. Schwab held the office of Librarian constituted a period of marked development in library administration, not only here but throughout the country; and in that development Mr. Schwab took a leading part. Mr. Putnam, Librarian of Congress, who probably had more to do with this work than any other man, spoke with admiration of the manner in which Mr. Schwab, coming into library administration without special training, had within three years placed himself at the head of his profession.

But Mr. Schwab's activities were never confined within any one line. Every enterprise for public betterment commanded his support. New Haven mourns him hardly less than Yale. In its musical activities, in its charitable organizations, and in its efforts for better government, he was ready to take his share and more than his share.

“His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand forth
And say to all the world, This was a man.”

Amun Hadley

In the death of JOHN LLOWE HOPKINS which occurred on the twenty-eighth day of July, nineteen hundred and fifteen, Yale and the Class of 1916 sustained the loss of a beloved and loyal friend. The shock occasioned his friends by the report of his death has been equalled only by the consequent feeling of loss. In the two years during which he was with us, his strong character, magnetic personality, gentlemanly conduct, and fairness of mind, won for him a lasting and tender place in the hearts of all his friends.

L. M. L.

JOHN ROBERT ALEXANDER LANNOM was born November 23, 1894, in Louisville, Ky., and died November 16, 1913, at Yale University.

He was possessed of an exceptionally keen mind, which, coupled with his ever cheerful nature, made him a friend of all who came in contact with him. His brilliant intellect made him an inspiring companion, and his inexhaustible fund of humor, an exceptionally congenial one. His tastes were catholic, and although he specialized in no particular field of extra-curriculum activity, he was interested in all of them.

His death came as a great shock to us all. It seemed inconceivable that one so brimful of life and cheerfulness, who meant so much to all who knew him, should so suddenly go out of our lives forever.

E. S.

On July 14th, 1914, at Delta, Colorado, occurred the death of BEAUMONT HENRY LYTTON as the result of an accidental pistol wound. It was with a real sense of profound sorrow that his friends learned of this affair which was made the more intense by its abruptness.

The leading spirit in "Bemo's" life was his unselfishness; and to be unselfish was not a habit he had acquired: it was in his very nature. He was indeed a thorough gentleman, reserved, generous, self-effacing and altogether a magnificent example of young manhood. The sorrow occasioned by his death is commensurate only with the admiration he commanded in life.

C. T. L., JR.

In the midst of a stormy life, a life fraught with hardships, yet full of promise, HERBERT LEO LAWRENCE MACDONALD was taken from us. So fearlessly did he meet all odds, so cheerfully did he look upon life in the midst of disappointments, that few of us knew the battle he was waging. The vigor of his personality commanded the respect and won the admiration of all of us. His whole-hearted participation in athletics as well as his brilliant, energetic work in the curriculum, have left upon the minds of his classmates an impression that will not soon fade away. We who have felt the spell of his buoyant spirit, and have seen the working of his indomitable will, shall ever find in them a high and noble inspiration.

MISCELLANY

NINETEEN-SIXTEEN AND THE WAR

AMBULANCE SERVICE IN FRANCE

In the summer of 1915 the class was represented in the greatest war of all history, by five members, Caldwell, Cowles, Hellier, A. Munson, and C. Munson, volunteering for ambulance work in France. That we were not more numerously represented at so important an event is probably owing to the fact that an indefinable something restrains us from crossing the street to see Cæsar if the roads be muddy. It is an old tradition at Yale that the bull dog is hard to arouse. But let that pass. Nineteen-thirty-two will probably see Yale decently interested in history in the making—if the war lasts that long.

It is too much of a chestful to tell all about the war in one breath. To call upon our classmates' letters written in the field is a better mode of procedure, like throwing pictures upon a screen, and far out-reaches in graphicness, the philosophizing of an author. Besides, a man at a distance has a way of saying, "War is hell" with a sweeping inclusive gesture. The only trouble with that is that war is only intense life after all, and like life sometimes is hell and sometimes is not. Anyhow, we feel more confidence in the words of a man who is actually in it.

France, after sitting up all night in a train from Bordeaux to Paris:—"When morning finally dawned the country looked beautiful,—little French fields all neatly kept, except very occasionally here and there,—and all would have been just the same as ever, had it not been for the soldiers. At every bridge stood one or two silent men. All along the line were boxes or hovels, some with men in them and some empty and at other places the grass was pressed where one or two had bivouacked the night."

A run for wounded to an artillery camp at the front:—"Suddenly we turned out of the town and plunged into a lonely pine forest, I sitting on the running board of the Mercedes. Down the pine road we went, meeting occasionally soldiers and officers, coming from and going to the trenches.

A. M. MUNSON,
AMBULANCE

Finally we came to a crossroads in the forest where a wagon stood with a crowd of men about it. It was the Red Cross wagon from the trenches, with the wounded man in it. Right there was the artillery camp. There were about twenty houses in all, little undergrowing hovels, covered with logs and sand. They had glass windows, real doors. Some had small gardens in front and fences around them, and others had flowerpots in the window frames. All the while the 'seventy-fives' were firing, for it was late in the afternoon when they usually opened up. They had walks laid out with rather artistic fences along the sides made out of some wood which bent easily and looked very much like that of which workbaskets are woven. Then one of the men showed me, with great pride, a cage made out of wire netting, with perches in it, in which they had about six birds. There were two or three little cats about. A little bewhiskered soldier in loose-fitting uniform and wobbly hat which had seen months of service picked one of them up and told me, without my asking, that its name was 'Sarah' and it was his."

Then again:—"He went way out very near to the trenches in an auto and lost the road and stopped. Then he heard rifle bullets, singing and banging on the trees, and he thinks to himself, thinks he, 'Twere better should I put me behind yon large tree,'—which he did and proceeded to smoke tranquilly. A soldier came along and told him his car was in full sight of the Germans, and besides he was standing on the wrong side of the tree."

Another writes:—"I have gotten rather to like cigarettes—French ones. It is a sure sign that I am becoming degenerate."

And from the same letter:—"I like night calls as everything is so picturesque: trench lights flaring up along the distant trenches, and a man on a stretcher transferred from a two-wheeled horse wagon, floored with straw, by the light of a lantern, to the automobile."

The following is a gripping anecdote which developed unconsciously in the pages of a rather rambling letter:—"I walked along a sort of trench out on the back of a bank to the cellar of the church, and then up into it. It was pretty much nothing but busted bricks. Every time we heard a shell singing overhead, I believe we all wished we were 'ter hum.' The first one that went over me, I'll swear, I held my breath from when I first heard it singing till it burst. Then after the first half dozen, we settled down, though we never lost interest or yawned Back of the church there was a barricade of cobble stones piled high across the street. The wounded men all looked pretty pale in the afternoon sun, but their artillery companions of the battery where they had been wounded crowded around them and said, 'Good-bye, my Comrade.' Then the wounded men, who were on stretchers slung under sort of steel push carts, smiled and said, 'Good-bye, my Comrade.' Two of them died later at the operating hospital."

From another letter:—"I really feel that we are doing a great deal of good here, and the soldiers we bring in certainly appreciate it. I tried to hold one man from bumping around so much on the rough road. He was practically dying, but he said, 'Ne vous derangez pas, Monsieur.'"

Then from a diary:

"Sept. 15.

Pont-à-Moun

Big bombardment of the "Pont" yesterday afternoon; incendiary shells and shrapnel. Town set fire to in two places and only one person killed. An aeroplane bomb landed within thirty feet of Lovell but luckily didn't go off. It seems funny that we should go on living here as usual, eating and sleeping, and watch Taubes and Aviatiks fly about directly over us. Often the French and Boche machines are up over the town at the same time, but they seem to take good care not to get close to one another—as Jean Huffer says, ‘They understand aviation too well.’ The sky is of course full of shrapnel and when the setting sun tints the cotton-like puffs of smoke pink and shines on the planes, it is a remarkable sight.

This morning at five or earlier I had a call to Monteauville and Clos Bois, an ‘officer.’ That is really the best time of the day here, nice and cool—one must wear coat and gloves driving; the valleys and hollows filled with mist and the forest-crested hills standing around. The French seem to realize the beauty of it, for they are all up—peasants about the villages and ouvriers (territorials) going up to the Bois le Prêtre. The American Ambulance is the only thing that eats petit déjeuner as late as seven o’clock.

Sept. 20.

P-à-M.

Talked with a telephonist to-day whose job it is to listen to the German telephones. They are grounded with a bayonet, as are the French also. But the French have a system or apparatus much like a wireless receiver, whereby they can hear through the ground the conversation on the German wires. I don’t understand it, so can’t explain it. Often the voices are not very clear, but at times they are quite so. By this method one knows when the Germans are going to attack and where, which section is promptly shelled by the 75’s, which rather dampens the ardour of the attack.”

Soon after Christmas two more members, Bostwick and Houpt, sailed for France, but so far news from them has been scanty. Later, perhaps, there will be more. For a young graduate just setting out into the vicissitudes of the world the war is invaluable, if only for the philosophy of the French "poilu." Whenever anything goes hopelessly wrong, "C'est la Guerre," he says, and leaves it at that. It saves so much time and definitely settles the question. A thing like that might be of use in after life. He who can say it never will be of service to him, is indeed fortunate,—but that is neither here nor there,—Vive la France!

C. B. Munson and W. Hellier

CONRAD WOEHLER

This sentiment of the ambulance volunteers is not endorsed by every member of the Class. One man, in particular, is actively engaged against la France. At the beginning of the war Conrad Woehler, better known as "Connie," "Count," was in his home in Dresden, Saxony. Finishing Sophomore year, he had sailed for Germany, expecting to spend the summer with his family, whom he had not seen in eight years, and to return in September. He had no sooner arrived in the country than war was declared and he found himself involved in it.

Many letters have been received from him since he first volunteered for service and in all he has remembered his classmates and his two years at Yale with the fondest memories, in spite of the life he has gone through. The first word was received September 4, 1914, being brought over by an American. He starts off: "Perhaps the last letter from me, as I must go to war, as have all my brothers here. I do it gladly, yet sadly." Fortunately this was not the last letter from Connie and he has survived nearly two years of actual service. He saw his first fighting in October, 1914, before Rheims, a letter dated February 2, 1915, beginning: "I have been in the trenches at Rheims since October 21. I am a volunteer of the Second Company, 13th Regiment of Saxon Jäger. Please greet all my friends and professors most heartily. Assure them that I think of them very often." In another letter that same month he described more in detail the bombproofs and the daily life in the trenches. "Since our battalion has been reinforced the individual soldier needs to serve on watch only 4-6 hours a day. He then works a couple of hours on the earthworks, and the rest of the time one can read, sleep and eat (the main things). You get a 'bomb' appetite in spite of the bombs and shells. I can picture what you are doing now. 'Let's go to the movies—Hellno!' I would only too well like to say: 'Here's hoping I may be able to again.'" Connie's New Haven education and good nature have not forsaken him.

WATCHING THE

During the summer of 1915 it was thought he had been killed, as a letter was returned to this country unopened with the following written across: "Auf Felds der Ehre gefallen." This was contradicted when word came from him direct. He had been shifted to the Eastern front and had taken part in the Russian campaign against Warsaw, being later confined to the rest camp in Posen. In the fall he returned to the fighting in France. During Senior year letters have been less frequent. He has been on several furloughs, either because wounded or sick, which he has evidently been prevented from stating. Because unable to take part in actual fighting, he spent part of the winter drilling recruits in the interior of Germany. Early in the spring he again joined his regiment.

Enlisting as a private, Connie had risen to the rank of Vicefeldwebel, which corresponds to a second sergeant, by May, 1915. Soon after this he wrote for his college record, which he needed to show in order to advance as an officer in the German army. Connie is the only member of the class who has been in actual service in the war. He has done his duty as he saw it. The battalion with which he is connected has several times distinguished itself and been mentioned for special service and bravery. Yet he has always hoped to be able to return and finish his course at Yale. The contrast between the war there and life here can hardly be realized and he looks to the latter as the pleasantest part of the past and a hope for the future. No better greeting to the class can be found than Connie's words in a recent letter: "Please remember me to all the good fellows who have thought of me, assure them that I very often think of them and the dear Yale Campus."

THE YALE ARTILLERY

I

During the army camps held at Plattsburg this summer, the attention of men attending from Yale was naturally drawn to the lack of all military training at this University. Not only had the men attending the camps from the Western universities had previous opportunities for military work, but such opportunities were to be found in the East as well. Thus Harvard had a battery made up almost entirely of her own men. Enquiries were made as to what form of training in colleges was most favored by the army, and it was learned that by far our greatest need was in field artillery. Prior to this some of the students at the camp had suggested a Yale cavalry troop, but after talking it over with the officers at Plattsburg, particularly Major-General Leonard Wood, all agreed on artillery work as the form to be introduced at Yale. Consequently a movement was set on foot after the return to college and enough men for four batteries enlisted within a few days.

At present the batteries have as large an enrollment as is possible under the existing state law, so that there are men on the waiting list who drill with the batteries, but who cannot be enlisted. It is expected that next year the Connecticut legislature will vote an increase in the militia strength of the State, so that the batteries can be recruited up to full strength. As it is, they average about 120 men each, and the total number of students enlisted, including those in the medical corps, is approximately 500.

These batteries are part of the Connecticut National Guard, and are designated "A," "B," "C," and "D." Together with the existing batteries at Branford (battery "E") and Stamford (battery "F") they form the Tenth Regiment of Militia Field Artillery.

As in any militia service, enlistment is for three years, but men who leave college before the expiration of their service will be mustered out for non-residence, unless they continue to reside in the vicinity, when they will be required to complete their three years of service. An opportunity is offered for men to place their names upon a reserve list after finishing their service, and from these men the batteries will be recruited to war strength (171 men each) in the event of hostilities.

Funds for an armory have been partially guaranteed by graduates interested in the work.

The extreme importance of field artillery has been shown more clearly than ever by the present European war. Whether fighting against an enemy intrenched or unintrenched, shrapnel fire is necessary to prepare the way for an attack, and to cover the attack while it is under way. On the defensive it is equally important in stopping the enemy's advance. Yet our army at present is short of field guns, and lacks enough trained men fully to man even the guns it does possess. In case of war our first need would be more trained artillery. When we add to this the fact that artillery, more than infantry or cavalry, requires a high degree of intelligence among the personnel, we see that our colleges have here a great chance to be of service to the country.

Morris Hudley

II

The army camps held at Plattsburg during the summer of 1915 aroused a storm of dissatisfaction with conditions at Yale in the breasts of the martial delegates from New Haven. They saw men from Western colleges easily surpass them on the imaginary field of battle because of previous training. This could have been endured had it not been discovered that at Harvard there was a regiment of infantry composed almost entirely of her own hirelings. This was the last straw—Yale must don the uniform.

The first outward manifestation of Yale's military spirit was called forth by the Mexican trouble, which took the form of several sporadic but none the less zealous outbursts and culminated in a parade inspired by pistol shots of a few incendiaries on the Oval. Beating on impromptu cymbals and shouting vociferously, this procession had advanced to the residences of Secretary Stokes, and Professors Taft and Phelps, where they demanded speeches. The need of organization was evidenced by the fact that the exact nature of these gatherings was not clear even to the participants themselves, who one moment enthusiastically echoed General Sherman's famous remark and the next shouted with as much fervor, "We want war." This outburst was severely stigmatized by the Journal-Courier and subsequently by publications from "Maine to California" as jingoism.

However, here was the fuel. All that was necessary was the spark. Nineteen-sixteen possessed two efficient sparks in the persons of Morris Hadley and Stew Bullivant. The officers at Plattsburg, particularly Major-General Wood, all agreed that the artillery was that branch of the service which it would be most advisable to join. There were several reasons. The European War was proving conclusively the growing importance of artillery; the United States army hardly possessed enough men to man its guns and, lastly, this branch was in need of a higher degree of intelligence than the others. The "sparks" assured the officers that Yale was the place to look for this quality.

Preparations began early in October with several articles in the News. It was planned to have one battery consisting of 133 men and five officers. However, when 950 men had signed application blanks, this arrangement was seen to be inadequate. Hereupon the Government stepped into the breach and authorized the enlistment of four batteries.

The time for enlistment came and the floor of the Gym presented an unusual sight. Seated at tables, stools and various machines of torture, the novitiates struggled with yards of enlistment blanks. The Inquisition of the physical examination followed, but it soon became evident that Herculean qualities were not insisted upon.

As a result, four batteries, averaging 120 men each, were enlisted as a part of the Connecticut National Guard. Together with the medical corps, about 500 men were enrolled under the command of Robert M. Danford, a lieutenant of the regular army, and ranking as major commanding the Tenth Connecticut Field Artillery.

Drills were next in order, adding at least one hour and a half to the schedule of every man. The basic principles of "counting off" were explained and soon the Cage reëchoed with "One, two, three, four," bellowed or piped in seven different octaves. Ned Howe helped things along by clearly demonstrating how not to right-about-face. Art Lane proved of invaluable service to the men in his section; they soon discovered that, to keep in step they simply had to be at variance with him.

The demand for uniforms was met, and, a few weeks after measuring, a series of forced marches was made to the equipment station in Welch. During these maneuvers the columns were subjected to a severe fusillade of fire from the heights of surrounding dormitories, consisting of commands varying from "Halt" to "Don't fire till you see the whites of their eyes." Several darkly hinted that the French system of uniforms of one size for short men and one for tall men was to be adopted. Their hopes were dashed to the ground by the appearance of the strangely costumed forms of Lloyd Bissell and Kin Tener, who loomed up as sacrifices to longitude. Bill Bowden resembled a needle removed to the *n*th power, and the officers sighed that they could not have an army composed of such difficult targets. However, in view of the numbers accoutered it was agreed that the tailor had done fairly well and that it was a relief to the eyes to have the long lines of drab interspersed with a coat or pair of trousers of different hue. The manners of the officers were aped in order to acquire the true military carriage. When not at attention it was discovered that it was "en regle" to saunter with hands in the hip pockets and hat inclined at an angle of forty-five degrees.

Soon after the demerit system was introduced; Sergeant Cropper took his post with notebook and pencil, and woe to him who shifted his hat or hitched his belt! Battery "C" took a severe fall from grace on one occasion and some say it could scarcely be blamed. The circumstances were as follows: Stew Bullivant, while changing the command of a section, suffered a relapse, and, imagining himself at a far different gathering, announced that "Corporal D—— would take the place of Brother S——y." Sergeant Cropper had to sharpen his pencil twice.

Yale's political system, more labyrinthine than the most ingenious minion of Tammany could ever devise, was presently given an opportunity to prove its worth at the election of officers. The returns showed that seven '16 men had received the necessary support from their constituents. Stew Bullivant, Reg Field, Morris Hadley, General Kimberley, Cal Littlefield, Charlie Neave and Dus Sanderson were those chosen. Morris Hadley was appointed to the position of Acting Adjutant and Mel Cary was made Quartermaster and Commissary Sergeant.

Wigwagging was introduced and the batteries gave all the appearance of learning how to fly while they interpreted the movements of Sergeant Cropper as he balanced himself in a perilous position on a caisson. It is hoped that those who will have to translate the messages sent by Yale wigwaggers will be able to speak all languages. The batteries at the present writing have made considerable headway; as many as two men in a line frequently have their arms in the same position.

Choice of occupation was given between serving guns, driving, or special detail service. Many chose to serve a gun instead of a horse but the sound of "equitation" proved to be a great drawing-card. An announcement that an Aero Corps was to be organized was received with much enthusiasm, especially by those residing in the heights of fifth-floor regions, for whom great altitude had no terrors.

The hospital service provided an outlet for those who claimed to be more humanely minded. About sixteen, mostly sons of '16, enrolled, and Hop Perry was given the operating implements of leadership. The mysteries of carrying dead and wounded were explained, and thereafter those who would volunteer as corpses were at a premium and the mercy of their roommates. Dull thuds began to echo from room to room as the bodies of "dead" men, possessed of an uncanny limpness, slipped from the embrace of their would-be rescuers.

Announcements to the effect that there would be an encampment at Tobyhanna, Pa., after Commencement were made from time to time. In all probability '16 will be well represented, as there are many who regard the two dollars per day wage as a considerable increase over their expected earnings in such trades as stone-breaking or brick-laying.

It seems inadvisable in closing this account to add that the Yale Artillery will always be found where the ammunition is thickest, as this trite remark is usually interpreted in a very unflattering manner. However, in the case of a Bridgeport riot it is not inapplicable and in this light it is hoped that the reader will regard it.

THE OVAL IS HIS BEAT

STATISTICS

A "FAVORITE AMUSEMENT"

THE FABLE OF THE QUEER BIRD AND THE SENIOR STATISTICS

CHAPTER I

Once upon a time there was a Queer Bird. He wasn't a Yale Type at all. He had been Sent to New Haven by a Fond Parent who had once met a Yale Man and had been impressed by his Sterling Seven Point Qualities. Guy (for such was the Q. B.'s name) was a Nice Boy, and very Good to his mother, but he just Didn't Fit at College. He had the most Remarkable Ideas. He believed that he had come to College to Get an Education. This of course might have been Overcome in Time, but Guy had other Strange Notions equally Ridiculous. He would do the Strangest Things, such as Going over to the Library, even when he didn't have an Essay to Write. And he used to Read Books which were not Required. Of course his Classmates soon Found this Out and Tried to Stop It. They showed him that if he wanted to Make Good, he would have to Work for Yale. They pointed to various "Big Men" who were Busy as the Deuce Running Something or Other. And they took Guy with them to various Rooms and Eating Joints in order that he might Broaden himself by finding out what the class was Thinking about. But although Guy Learned that Charlie Chaplin got Fifty Thousand Dollars a Week, and that Edna was Married, and that Francis X. Bushman was at the Globe, he didn't seem to Evince much Interest, and in fact refused to submit any more to the Broadening Influence of Contemporary Conversation. He was Hopeless. He played on the Soccer Team because he felt that Athletics were a Means and not an End, which shows how Queer he really was. His favorite poem was not

DOUBLE-CROSSING THE BAR

"Crossing the Bar," nor his favorite novel "Henry Esmond." He was Peculiar enough not to think that there was Something Wrong with Yale because the Football Team had Lost. He got an Education but it wasn't a Hell of a Lot of Fun; Guy was often as Low as a Snake.

CHAPTER II

But Guy was no Boob. After he graduated he went into Business and in Ten Years had amassed a Huge Fortune. He was one of the leaders in his City. His fellowmen had Somehow gotten over the Idea that he was Queer, and were Always Glad to See Him. He had even been Elected to the Elks.

One day his Family Doctor came to him and whispered that his Better Half would soon present him with an Heir, and Guy was Pleased as Punch, for he had always wanted a Son. But then and there he determined that the Boy should Enjoy his College Life and not go through the Misery that he had Suffered. He took down his Class Book and Looked Up the Class Statistics, for he thought that by So Doing he could find out Much about How to Be Happy Although an Undergraduate.

The First Thing he looked at was the "Most Valuable Thing You Have Obtained from Your College Career." There were Many Different Answers. One answered "Independence," another "Concentration." Many of them said that "Acquaintances" and "Friendships" were the most Valuable Things. Other answers were "How To Take Disappointments," "Breadth," "Intellect," "Appreciation of Literature," "Poise," "Discipline," "Self-Confidence," "An Ideal of Public Service," "Sense of Proportion," "Self-Knowledge," "Mental Labor," "Destruction of Most Cherished Beliefs," "Character," "A Knowledge of the Value of Work," "Insight," "A Respect for the Man with Knowledge," "A Loss of Religious Denomination with a Consequent Gain in Faith," "A Basis for Understanding Present Day Conditions."

Guy next looked at the "Things Which You Most Regret About Your College Course," for he Knew That Here he should get some Valuable Hints about what his Son Should Not Do. The Answers were Varied. Some said "Failure to Go Out for Things," "Lack of Friends," "That I Came Too Young," "Limitations Imposed by Finances." Other answers were, "Idleness," "Poor Courses," "Not Having Studied," "Failure to Stand for a Principle," "Superficial Relations to Men," "Hypersensitivity," "Failure to Participate in Athletics," "Failure to Go to Library," "Failure to Room with Class," "Hours Failed," "Wasted Time," "That the Course is Only Four Years Long," "Failure to be an Honor Man," "Four Football Defeats by Harvard," "Compelled to Commute," "Spending Too Much Time with New Haven People," "Enforced Relations with Battell Chapel." One man regretted Nothing, while the Chief Regret of Another was "A Trip to Bridgeport."

Guy, Being Very Well Off Financially, decided that He would Celebrate the Coming Birth of his Heir by Making a Gift to his Alma Mater. He therefore again turned to his Class Statistics, concerning "Yale's Greatest Need." Here he found Diverse Answers, among them being the following: "Endowment," "A Football System," "Instructors," "Personal Christianity," "Dormitories," "A New Museum," "A New Library," "A Sense of Unity by Means of More Dormitories," "An Awakening from the Present Attitude of Self-Satisfaction," "A Fighting Spirit," "More Coöperation between the Faculty and the Students," "More Social Meetings of the Student Body," "More Respect for Radicalism," "More Tennis Courts," "A Branch of Public Life to Supply with Men," "Graduate Athletic Control," "The Welding of Academic and Sheff," "A Union."

Glancing down the Page, Guy's Eye fell upon the "Suggestions for an Increased Interest in Scholarship." Some of These were the following: "Place Emphasis on Learning Rather than on Marks," "Exam Exemption," "Greater Mingling of Instructors and Pupils," "Better Instructors," "More Professors with Personality," "More Attention to Individualism," "Increasing Social Recognition for Scholarship," "Better Freshman and Sophomore Courses," "Lower Phi Beta Kappa Requirements," "Smaller Classes," "Better Freshman Faculty," "Less Mental Discipline in First Two Years," "Monthly List of Marks," "Fewer Two O'clock Classes," "More Prizes and Scholarships," "More Elizabethan Clubs," "Removal of Scientific Attitude of Mind," "Some Reward for Those Just Missing Phi Beta Kappa," "Have Professors Mark the Papers." One cynic answered "Impossible in America."

Now Guy wanted to be sure that his Offspring chose Yale instead of Some Other College, so he Glanced at the "Reasons for Coming to Yale" in order to Get the Dope. Most of the answers were "Relatives" or "Friends." Other answers were "Reputation as The National American College," "Democracy," "Yale's Ideas Stood for a Vigorous Type of American Manhood," "Proximity," "Spirit," "Athletic Reputation," "Ease of Self-Support," "Sanity of Atmosphere," "Environment," "Compulsory Chapel," "Having Seen the Disastrous Effect of Harvard on Several Close Friends," "Desire to Play on Yale Team," "Course of Study," "Tradition for Grit," "Fighting Qualities," "Sportsmanship," "President Hadley."

"Now," said Guy, "I have All the Dope. My Boy will Surely Enjoy his College Life much more than I did. I shall Bring Him Up According to these Statistics."

Just then the Family Doctor Beckoned Guy to Come and See the Latest Arrival.

ONE MINUTE INTERVIEWS

Tris Savage of the Elm-Vard Ogden or Delta Subversive—Puzzle Little Personification

Captain Hampton of the '14 team when spoken to about the coming season said the annual harvest of the bovine fauna will be held on the first Tuesday of next week. Usually, it will be held in the Yale Bowl, entrance to be made through portal 23, and it is essential that every man be equipped with a large sized necktie. Further he said that it was with great pleasure that he had been able to persuade 'Johanna in Tau' to remain over and participate in the coming struggle. It was noted that in speaking of the above he called her 'Jk.' This is one of Hampton's characteristics which obtained for him his enviable position in the Omicron.

John in tau said that Morris Hadley flunked out of college? He was with a nice fellow.

When interviewed about Terrence and Paul Jones 'Rip' Cutler said that he was a fine man and that when crew work was over he was going to read his book about Paul Revere.

We ask that Terrence would say 'Yes' or 'No' about that box record which is so awful.

Andrea Del Sarto Gambardella the famous French musician, who has broken to about the foreign situation here. Well I should never.

An interview was attempted with the George Haupt but getting was impossible owing to his vocal rendition of that famous song entitled 'Berenice'. Farewell to the Herd King sung by Apollo with the beautiful eye. During his time the sea and our life has been able to enter his room.

"ONE MINUTE, PLEASE"

Scand's Titus when asked to compare Shell and Academic men for man, replied that the trouble with the Academic men is that they don't drink enough and not fast enough.

It was a great pleasure to find Morgan Spigle in town the other day, where he had come to get a change of underclothing. He remarked on how well New Haven was looking and asked concerning several of his old friends. When told that Caldwell was absolutely set on Whiskol's he burst into tears. Captain Burgess of the hockey team, outlined the training plans for the coming year. "I intend taking my two best strikers Spigle and Pomeroy to Atlantic City the first of November. While there, we shall make our headquarters on the Millbrook Mall. We'll take our meals at the Macborough System. Our managers will consist in reading in wicker chairs published by numerous Ebbotsons, and in training Spigle to watch his step. A very light lunch will be indulged in, consisting of two broons and a bottle of beer after which we will play in the sand. Our evening repast will consist of a short roller skate a little dancing ending up by a visit to all the leading bars. It will be necessary to come to the Harvard game this year owing to a meeting."

Pledges to Be Seen in the German Government With His Own Dictation—The Federal Crisis

In this time of general hysteria and xenophobia, petitions seem most opportune, not so aggressive. Therefore the undersigned have taken upon themselves the duty to evidently help the cause of drawing up the following resolutions, which will be presented to the Imperial German Government on behalf of the people of the United States, Chile, and Arkansas as soon as five members of 1916 sign it—

"YALE UNIVERSITY, 'IN THE CITY OF NEW HAVEN,' May 17, 1915."

TONIGHT'S THE NIGHT

JUNIOR PARTY AT TAFT AT 8 ALL-STAR CAST TO PROVIDE ENTERTAINMENT

Light and Dark Retirements—Premier Vaudeville Offerings—"More Dues Paid"

This evening at 8 in the Taft Palm Room, the Class of 1916 will hold its first smoker. An exceptional and unique entertainment has been provided for the occasion. Colations will be served.

Opening the ball will be choice selections by the Bulldog Quartet, which will do favorites well rendered, and many pleasing and popular tunes should make the work of these selected young songsters popular with the local boys.

Following this comes Anna Eva Hunsaid Jones, who has appeared before crowned heads in Europe and who is now brothers fighting in the austrian army. She is, moreover, endowed with occult powers and manifestly, by evidence before her, clever mediumism.

South, South and South have a clever act entitled "The Fall of Antwerp," in which they successfully impersonate the German army and show many of the secrets of the wonderful organization of that fighting machine. The audience is requested to refrain, during this act, from any expression of partnership and to avoid this strict neutrality be maintained.

The Musical Mavens in "Fun on a Beach" feature the next act on the program, and it is rumored that these kids are clever. Their act is a very distinct from the customary, red-washed minstrel offerings. It is a non-musical and non-stilted act. It was a few choice selections."

Walter J. Freeman was interviewed yesterday as he was hanging by a rope from the flagpole on the Green photographic his class.

mates from this novel viewpoint. Mr. Freeman, it might be remarked in passing, has quite a reputation for this, having photographed several trees which have rarely before been photographed, 12-13 being his favorite hour. "Walt" descended from his precarious perch with a numbness nothing short of marvelous and a rather hearty greeting. "Well?" After some minutes he was induced to describe some of his experiences as a Couplant Hebler. (Mr. Freeman is now on the Photographic Department of the Couplant which costs but $2.50 a year.)

"I started taking pictures when I was about 12 years old. I was listening but I was 'That boy, will do something yet.' My first camera was a Brownie Number Two (2 1/2 by 3 1/2) and I used to take everything there. Mr. Freeman smiled reminiscently as he murmured 'Good God, how I loved that girl!'"

Sheep Man Describes Fighting-Road Bullish Day-Says "It's Hell!" Was Popular in Class

Walter Wauhmough, 1912 S. who is at present waiting relative in New Haven, Conn. (Mrs Wauhmough was Latta Ginzert before her marriage), was seen recently by a representative of THE CHICKEN'S at a cross-section. Elmo Steen "Walter" was one of the most popular men in Yale when here in 1914-'15, '16, '17, '18 and '19. He owned an auto and was well liked by all his classmates. While here he made a first and took part in several extra-curriculum duck-poking activities. He was the only man to come from Peoria High School to Yale in his class, and in high school was well liked by all, being vice-president of his class (Roth and Steen were the only two who were not in the class of 1914).

The Class Historian has given the Spring Librarian the following history of the Class of 1914:

The Class of Nineteen-Sixteen gave their first cheer for God, for Country, and for Yale, followed by some hearty "rah" for English, and we all felt that we were now at last, truly Yale men. Oh, how proud we were as we marched along—straggling, tramping, and our hearts beat high with fervid hopes. We knew not what the future held in store for us, as only knew that at last our dreams had come true and we were all college men—and might, just at YALE.

That night, as, tired but happily crawled into bed, we happened to ourselves "Bright College Years" and sketched our fates as we vowed that we would make good of Yale.

The next morning we rose bright and early and took our first good breakfast in the E. Lunch and forgotten to eat. (Narrowly and that big straggler 'Mr. Hartenstein. So this was Yale. "WAR IS HELL"

Walters was president. He said partly as follows and partly which we have omitted:

Damn these Fords! A fellow can't cross Elmo Steen without being—oh, yes, you would to know about the war. Well when I and Mrs. Wauhmough's (she with a pardonable smile of pride) went to Europe on our honeymoon last August—no, September—no, August we had no suspicion of the awful array of artillery and the shattering struggle which was soon to engulf the nations of the world. I remember just as plain as day. I said to Lotta, "If I get there it was soon, but she said 'Pohay, Walter!'" About two days after we landed at Paris, France, Lotta caught the influenza and was confined to her bed, and so I didn't get out much. We could hear the troops go by singing the "Marseilles," and now and then some more troops would go by. Lotta she got well and we sailed for home, but I tell you, men can't see what I seem and not get older. You fellows don't know what it means, but mark me as just what Brian said, "War is Hell!"

An interesting article is here submitted by Dr. Wango, coach of the Hallowell Tenate 'varsity crew, who has an eight-oared scull in the course to-morrow against its old-time rival, Harvard. Class Nineteen-in Embury Writes Class History—The Lights and Shadows of Three Years at Yale line, how we cheered, and cheered again at "Bush" Cutler and Bruce Morris dove into the frizzling mass of humanity and always, always for a gain. And when it rained on the day of our big game, how we were all disappointed. Thus began the 'New' and other competitions. It was a curious sight to see "Spider" Levy riding a bicycle in search of errand credit, or good old "Chick" Guernsey in his quest for an ad for his Couplant. And shall we ever forget our joy over an ad for the Couplant. And shall we ever forget our joy over an ad for the Couplant. And shall we ever forget our joy over an ad for the Couplant.
